A member on my right (Mr. RANDOLPH) has done me honor to notice an argument I brought forward some eight or ten days ago, and although he set out with declaring that he should treat it with more respect than I had treated that of the Chief Magistrate, I think I may appeal to the Committee to decide whether he has redeemed his pledge. Sir, I am growing old. I have had some little measure of experience in public life, and the result of that experience has brought me to this conclusion, that, when business of whatever nature, is to be transacted in a deliberative assembly, or in private life, courtesy, forbearance, and moderation, are best calculated to bring it to a successful conclusion. Sir, my age admonishes me to abstain from involving myself in personal difficulties; would to God that I could say I am also restrained by higher motives. I certainly never sought any collision with the gentleman from Virginia. My situation, at this time, is peculiar, if it be nothing else, and might, I should think, dissuade at least a generous heart from any wish to draw me into circumstances of personal altercation. I have experienced this magnanimity from some quarters of the House. But I regret that, from others, it appears to have received no such consideration. The gentleman from Virginia was pleased to say that, in one point at least, he coincided with me—in an humble estimate of my grammatical and philological acquirements. I know my deficiencies. I was born to no proud patrimonial estate; from my father I inherited only infancy, ignorance, and indigence. I feel my defects; but, so far as my situation in early life is concerned, I may, without presumption, say they are more my misfortune than my fault. But however I may regret my want of ability to furnish to the gentleman a better specimen of powers of verbal criticism, I will venture to say, it is not greater than the disappointment of this Committee, as to the strength of his argument. Sir, I am no preceptor; when I desire perfect accuracy of definition, or correctness of pronunciation, I may go to the highest authority in this House—probably in this country—the gentleman himself; but, in the meantime, I am very sure that my commentary on the word in question, has not yet been fairly met and refuted. The honorable gentleman from Virginia has asked, whether, in the preamble of the Constitution, the people of the United States are made to say that they adopt that instrument “in order to construct justice,” or to make justice. I answer, sir, in one sense, yes. In all that relates to that part of the penal code which assigns punishment to acts not immoral in themselves, but only criminal because prohibited by law, whatever is malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, the law creates the crime; the crime, as such, had no existence till the law defined and prohibited it. Here criminal justice is created, and a crime is constructed, and made by force of law.

The gentleman from Virginia says, that the settled sense of the Constitution for these thirty years past, may be gathered from the practice under it. But if his construction be true, no post road has yet been established; for, according to him, every one of them may be abrogated at pleasure by the States. The gentleman has gone for illustration to the small but respectable State of Delaware—and has said something about her “getting her back up,” and “resisting the passage of the United States troops.” Sir, is the Legislature of the State of Delaware, or of any other State, large or small, to resist and defeat the laws of Congress made by Delegates from every part of the Union? I know that the interest of the States is, in general, a guarantee against any resistance on their part, to the exercise of a power so beneficial as that of transmitting the mail; but we have seen cases of contest between a State and the General Government, in which their attachment to the Confederacy has not always been sufficient to restrain them, and we have seen them in peace and in war. A late instance occurred between the States of New York and Connecticut. When men's passions get up, there is no telling before hand into what measures they may be precipitated.

But, has the gentleman met my argument on the difference between the Constitution and the old Confederation? That the Government acts under the one by its own intrinsic energy, while by the other, it was dependent for every act upon the power of the State Legislatures? Has he shown that this principle of difference does not apply to post roads, as well as to any other branch of the powers of the Government? It is possible, I admit, that cases may be produced, in which the sense which the gentleman attributes to the word “establish” may hold—but, in the Constitution, as well as in the President's Message, it is used in the sense for which I contended.

It has been said that one leading motive which led to the adoption of the Federal Government, was the necessity of some general regulation for foreign commerce. I grant this; but I ask, are we to refer to the various motives which prevailed on the people to adopt the Constitution, or to the Constitution itself, for the principles of its interpretation? I will draw an illustration of this part of my subject from the records of that profession, of which the gentleman from Virginia has spoken, in no very respectful terms, but which has produced in all countries some of the ablest, wisest, and best men that have ever adorned our species. I advert to a case which is no doubt familiar to the gentleman's historical recollection, the famous Coventry act, which was passed in consequence of an affray that took place in the public streets of London, between some knights and other persons of distinction, and which prohibited, under severe penalties, the “drawing of blood in the streets;” no doubt ever did or could exist as to what was intended to be prohibited by this act; and yet, if its interpretation had been limited by the motive of its enactment or the preamble, it would have been restrained to the particular case which led to its passage. We must look into the instrument, to its words, and not out of it, for its true meaning. Resort may indeed be had to the preamble—but even the preamble is not suffered to control the interpretation. It is only used to assist in finding the meaning of equivocal and doubtful phrases. So in the present case—I know that commerce and revenue were leading considerations in the formation and adoption of the Constitution; but we are to look at the words of the grant, and though I would not say that we are wholly to reject all consideration of the motives, yet they are but of small avail in interpreting plain words in the instrument itself. Now, the self same words being applied in the Constitution to the powers of Congress over internal, that are applied to its powers over external, commerce, I contend that all powers given for the one are given for the other: the words are the same—the objects are the same. It is true, indeed, that, in the origin of the Government, it might not be necessary to insist on this interpretation, because there was then no pecuniary means to exercise the power, or at least, in a very partial extent—the same may be said of the power to establish post roads. The country was just out of a distressing war, followed by a distressing peace. The public revenue was in such a state, that it was doubted if it would be competent to pay the civil list—it is not wonderful that, at such a time, the Government did not use all the powers which it possessed.

Gentlemen have misstated, or misunderstood, what I said in relation to the exercise of powers confided to the Government. I never said that simply not to exercise these powers was treachery: but that when the public good required their exercise—and especially when none but Congress could exercise them, when Congress must exercise them, or they would not be exercised at all, then, not to use the power was treachery; and I still hold and repeat the sentiment. Although commerce and revenue were at first very leading motives to the Federal Constitution, are we to limit the Constitution by this rule? Let us remember that then the country had scarcely any interior, there were few settlements, and but few settlers, beyond the Alleghany Mountain. The whole interior has grown up since the Constitution was adopted; and though this gives no new power, yet it may and ought to call forth every dormant power conveyed by that instrument, the exertion of which may tend to the public prosperity. It presents a new case—new relations—new interests; and certainly it is the duty of Congress to look to the whole—to remember we have an internal as well as an external commerce; and to seek to enable this country to say, what has been so often proudly said in England—"England is England's best customer." I hope that it will yet be said, America is America's best customer. Sir, a new world has come into being since the Constitution was adopted. Are the narrow limited necessities of the old thirteen States, of indeed parts only of the old thirteen States, as they existed at the formation of the present Constitution, forever to remain a rule of its interpretation? Are we to forget the wants of our country? Are we to neglect and refuse, the redemption of that vast wilderness which once stretched unbroken beyond the Alleghany? I trust not, sir. I hope for better and nobler things. The gentleman intimates that the General Government may have powers in time of war which it does not possess in time of peace; but I ask, has it any powers but what it holds by grant of the Constitution, expressed or fairly implied? And if not, does it not possess the same powers at all times? True it is, that in peace many of these powers are not called forth into action and exercise—but they exist nevertheless, or the Constitution is a nullity. Sir, is war a source of power? Is necessity a source of power? Surely not. The Government holds its powers not by peace, or war, but by the Constitution. I ask whether, while peace yet continues, the Government has no powers which are preparatory, but which have a direct relation to war? May it not cast cannon? May it not provide muskets, to put into the hands of a hardy and gallant yeomanry? May it not make forts?—and if it may do all these, do I advance a single step, when I ask, may it not make roads also? Yes sir. I do say roads are in place of forts, and in a great measure dispense with the necessity of building them: roads collect the moveable force of the country, and condense it on whatever point may be attacked or threatened by an enemy. What was told us, when, the other day, we voted for a road in Arkansas? That the great body of population in that Territory was separated by a wilderness, from that in other States, impracticable and impassable; and we voted for that road as a measure of defence—and it is a measure of defence—far more effectual than fortifications would have been.

Another gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) employed a species of argument, the propriety of which I again submit to his candor. He takes up all the various Constitutional sources, whence the friends of the bill draw the power, and examines them separately, and in detail. And, contending that no one of them would induce Congress to pass the bill, dismisses the whole in succession. Now, sir, is not this treating the subject upon grounds of expediency and not of power? He asks if you would make these internal improvements for the purpose merely of transporting the mail? Or for that of facilitating the distribution of the public force? Or for that of promoting internal commerce among the several States? And, emphatically pronouncing the negative, in reference to each of those several objects, the gentleman seemed to think that the Committee ought to come to the same conclusion to which he brought himself, that this power does not exist. Is it fair, thus to pass in review the various objects, and to pronounce, that, since no one of them, considered by itself, would lead to the adoption of the proposed policy, the bill ought not to pass? The motive for the exercise of power is one, and a totally different thing, from the power itself. It might be conceded, that no one of the objects suggested, considered apart, would present a sufficient motive to enact the bill; and yet, that the aggregate effect of the whole of them united, would present an adequate motive. In truth, almost the whole argument against the bill is virtually an argument on expediency, rather than power. The gentlemen argue from extreme cases; but, if their argument amounts to any thing, it is good against the exercise of any power whatever, and applies as much to any and every other power of the Government, even to those literally and expressly granted, as it does to the incidental power now in dispute. The power of taxation is a power expressly granted; and taxation may be carried so far as to take away the last dollar from every man in the community. But, is this good argument against the existence of the power? So gentlemen ask us if we are going to make 80,000 miles of post roads? No, sir; but this does not operate as a reason why we may not such as are called for by the wants and the safety of the country.

The gentleman from Virginia has reminded me of the many obligations conferred by this Government upon the West—and, among them, has spoken of the grants of land for education. I ask the gentleman, Were not these paid for? Have not these school lots raised the value of the whole body of United States land by which they were surrounded? Sir, the Western States have never yet received any thing from this Government for which they have not given an equivalent. They have paid a quid for every quo. Was the West allowed to buy its land of the Indians; or, did not the whole avails go into your own exchequer? You yourselves desired it. And, as to the Indian wars, were they not necessary for the safety of the whole Union? [Here Mr. RANDOLPH interposed, and denied having adverted to the Indian wars.] If he did not, said Mr. C., then I must say he has made out a wretched list of benefits. Sir, I regret the introduction of such a topic. It is one on which I should never have dwelt, unless forced into its discussion. But I will say, in leaving it, that the sale of your land to the people of the West, has brought more money into your Treasury than has been acquired in the sale of the public domain of all the Powers of Europe together who own American colonies. I know it may be said that there is no compulsion, and that the whole of this revenue is from voluntary purchase. True, sir; but is this parental Government to look, in the spirit of Shylock, only at the bond? If its policy, by whatever circumstances, has practically operated to drain one portion of the country of its money, ought not the Government, like a wise and considerate parent, to counteract this enfeebling process by the adoption of a broad and beneficent national policy, especially when that may be done, not only without doing injury to any other part, but so as to advance the prosperity of all? With this appeal to the equitable feelings and the sound discretion of the Committee, Mr. C. said, he should close what he had now to say; and, as it had been with reluctance that he rose, he now sat down with equal pleasure.

Mr. CLAY having concluded; on motion of Mr. TRIMBLE, the Committee rose and reported, and obtained leave to sit again.

Previous to the Chairman leaving the Chair—

Mr. HAMILTON rose in his place, and stated that he wished, though in a very informal way, to make a communication, to which, from its nature, he was sure every gentleman would listen with interest. The House had all witnessed, with regret, the very unpleasant altercation which, during a late debate, had taken place between two honorable members of this House. He was now the bearer of the agreeable intelligence that, through the spontaneous interposition of friends, the state of feeling which arose on that occasion had been successfully removed, and had been exchanged in a manner highly honorable to both the parties, for a happier one; the gentlemen had been restored to each other in relations of mutual amity and personal respect, and every painful recollection removed—he congratulated the House on so happy an issue of an affair which all who witnessed it could not but deeply deplore.

MONDAY, February 2.

The House proceeded to consider the proposition submitted by Mr. Cook, on the 12th ultimo, to amend the rules of the House; and, being read,

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the same, by substituting, in place thereof, the following:

"A member having a petition to offer, without a formal presentation of it to the House, may deliver it to the Clerk, his name being endorsed thereon, with a memorandum of the standing committee to which he desires it to be referred; and it shall be accordingly entered by the Clerk, under the direction of the Speaker, in the Journal of the day upon which it is so offered; reserving, however, to any member, the right to make, if he deem it proper, a formal presentation of the petition.

"If a petition be erroneously referred, the chairman of the committee charged with it may, through the hands of the Clerk, pass it to the chairman of the proper standing committee; and an entry shall be made on the Journal, under like direction, discharging the first committee from the consideration of the petition, and referring it to the last mentioned committee, on the day of such transfer. If there be a disagreement between the chairmen, the House shall decide."

The amendment being read, and debate arising, the subject was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FORSYTH presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the county of Camden, in the State of Georgia, praying that measures may be adopted for the cutting a canal from the river St. Mary's, along the southern extremity of the Oguefenoka Swamp, to the waters of the Suwanee river; which petition was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. NEALE presented the memorial of sundry inhabitants of the town and county of Alexandria, in opposition to the memorial of the Common Council of Alexandria, heretofore presented to this House.

Mr. MERCER presented a memorial of sundry merchants and millers, in Prince William County, in the State of Virginia, praying that the acts of the Common Council of Alexandria, in relation to the inspection of flour, may be revised and amended.

The said memorials were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, requesting that Congress will make provision for the continuation of the national road from Wheeling to the river Mississippi; which resolution was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the bill for the continuation of the Cumberland Road.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, praying for the aid of Congress in opening a canal navigation between the river Wabash and the river Miami of Lake Erie; which memorial was referred to the Committee of the Whole to which the bill upon that subject is committed.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, respecting the continuance of the national road to the Mississippi river, a copy of that this day presented by the Speaker.—Referred to the select committee appointed on the 9th of December last, upon the subject of the two per cent. fund, set apart from the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the making of roads.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, by resolution of the 15th of December, and to whom was referred a memorial of inhabitants of Fernandina, in Amelia Island; reported a bill granting donations of land to certain actual settlers in the Territory of Florida; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred by resolution, on the 24th of December, and to which was also referred, on the 22d December, a petition of inhabitants of that part of West Florida now attached to the State of Louisiana, reported a bill supplementary to the several acts providing for ascertaining and adjusting the titles and claims to land in the Saint Helena and Jackson Courthouse land districts; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill for the relief of William King; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Mareen Duvall, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MATTOCKS, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of Lemuel Arms, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Ordered, That John Biddle, who contested the election and return of Gabriel Richard, the delegate from the Territory of Michigan, have leave to withdraw his memorial and documents.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, the first of which is in the words following:

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 11th of December last, requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the House all such parts of the correspondence with the Government of Spain, relating to the Florida treaty, to the period of its final ratification, not heretofore communicated, which, in his opinion, it might not be inconsistent with the public interest to communicate, I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of the correspondence requested.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 2, 1824.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

[These documents, in extenso, will be found in the Appendix to the Annals, Second Session, Sixteenth Congress.]

The second Message is as follows :

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

I transmit, herewith, to the House of Representatives, a report from the Secretary of State, together with a digest of recent commercial regulations of foreign countries, prepared in compliance with a resolution of the House, of the 30th of January, 1823.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RANKIN laid before the House a communication addressed to him, as Chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, detailing the situation and state of the business in that office, and asking that provision may be made for the temporary employment of an additional number of clerks; which communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting a pre-emption right to all persons who are settled upon the public lands on the banks of the Mississippi, for the purpose of aiding and facilitating steam navigation upon said river.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law to encourage settlement on the public lands upon the banks of the Mississippi river, with a view to improve the navigation of said river.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the rights of the State of Louisiana to the cypress swamps within the limits of said State, and that such report be made as the rights, justice, and expediency of the case may require.

On motion of Mr. McCoy, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a branch of the district court for the western district of Virginia, at Stanton.

ADDITIONAL INDIAN AGENCIES.

On motion of Mr. Cocke, chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the orders of the day were postponed, to take up a bill for the appointment of two additional Indian agents. The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole on the consideration of the bill.

[This bill provides, first—"That, from and after the passage of this act, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint two Indian agents, in addition to those already provided by law, to be stationed on the western side of the Mississippi, at such places as he may think proper.

"Second. That the agents appointed according to the provisions of this act, shall receive a compensation for their services of one thousand three hundred dollars each, in full, and that all rations, or other allowances, made to them, shall be deducted from the sums hereby allowed."]

On this bill, which the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs assured the House would not detain them ten minutes, a desultory debate arose, which continued till past three o'clock.

The object of the bill, as well as the circumstances which gave rise to it, were stated by Mr.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

H. OF R.

COCKE, who referred the Committee to a letter of the Secretary of War. This letter, together with a document accompanying it, exhibiting the present number and emoluments of all the Indian superintendents, agents, and sub-agents, now employed by the United States, was read at the request of Mr. RANKIN.

The expediency of the bill was advocated by Messrs. COCKE, CONWAY, CLAY, and COOK; and opposed by Messrs. RANKIN, ROSS, FLOYD, VANCE of Ohio, and FOOT of Connecticut.

The grounds insisted on in its favor were the disorderly state of the Indians on the Arkansas river and its vicinity, produced in part by the removal of the remnants of other tribes into that Territory and its neighborhood, in consequence of an exchange of their lands elsewhere for lands there. Some of these were from tribes who inherited an ancient grudge against each other, and almost the whole of them were more or less dissatisfied with the arrangement which had placed them there. They were now in a very lawless state, and committed great depredations on the property of the settlers; and recent intelligence had been received of actual hostilities and bloodshed. Two agents were as few as could be assigned for this region, and it was hoped that their presence and influence with the ordinary means employed in such agencies, would have an operation to restrain these excesses.

The opposition to the bill was directed chiefly against an increase of the present number of Indian agents, many of whom were represented as having very little to do, and as enjoying situations that approached to sinecures. Some of these might be removed to the Arkansas, if agents were thought necessary there. It was incongruous to increase the number of Indian agents, while the number of Indians themselves was on the decrease. The Governor of the Territory of Arkansas was already, ex officio, an Indian superintendent. The legislation, now proposed, would be partial and imperfect. The entire system ought to undergo a thorough revision. Agents should be removed from places where they were useless, and transferred to other spots on our frontier, where their presence was more needed, and some of them might be dispensed with altogether. Besides, the discontents of the mixed multitude of Indians who had been crowded and concentrated on the Arkansas, were not to be assuaged by appointing agents. Those discontents were founded too deeply to be reached by such a remedy. They were the consequences of the oppressions exercised on the Indians in intrusions by the whites on their hunting grounds; a practice that was carried to a pernicious excess. (A single white hunter often having thirty, forty, and a hundred hands, employed at once in trapping, while the poor Indian owned but a single trap.) If we would prevent the further effusion of blood, it must be by an efficient system of measures putting an end to this practice.

Mr. COCKE moved to fill the blank, designating the salary with one thousand three hundred dollars, which was carried.

An attempt was made to lay the bill on the table, and lost—ayes 54, noes 107.

Mr. SCOTT proposed to amend the bill, by inserting the words, "In the Territory of Arkansas and west thereof;" but, before the question was taken, on motion of Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, the Committee rose, and asked leave to sit again, which was refused by the House.

Mr. COOK then moved that the bill lie on the table—which motion prevailed—and the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

TUESDAY, February 3.

Mr. CROWNSHIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act rewarding the officers and crews of two gigs, or small boats, under the command of Lieutenant Francis H. Gregory, of the United States Navy," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VINTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the petition of John Henry Rentrop, reported a bill, authorizing repayment for land erroneously sold by the United States; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDWARDS, from the same committee to which was referred the petition of Sewall Fullam, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Rist; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee on Commerce, made a report on the petition of William Porter, accompanied by a bill to authorize the issuing a register to the brig William of New York; which bill was read twice, and ordered to lie on the table.

The resolution submitted on Friday last, by Mr. TRACY, was taken up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKE laid the following resolution on the table for consideration on to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House a statement, showing the situation of any suit or suits which have been or are now depending, in which the United States are interested, for the recovery of the possession of a tract of land, commonly called "the Pea Patch," and on which Fort Delaware is situated, specifying the amount of money paid by the United States in each case, to whom paid, and the times, respectively, by whom, on what account, and from what fund.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of appropriations for the service of the year 1823, showing the amount appropriated under each specific head, the amount expended under each, and the balance remaining unexpended in the Treasury on the 31st of December, 1823; which letter and statement were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, with all the books and reports of the several boards of commissioners and recorder of land titles, made out and transmitted to the Treasury Department, under the several acts of Congress, and the instructions predicated thereon, relative to the adjustment of land titles in the former district of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, now State of Missouri, and Territory of Arkansas, forwarded in obedience to a resolution adopted in this House on the 14th ultimo; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Ordered, That the Message of the President of the United States, dated on the 22d January, 1823, communicated to this House at the last session of Congress, accompanied by a report of a survey of the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, from the rapids of the river Ohio at the mouth of the river Mississippi, be referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, it was Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs have power to call for persons and papers touching so much of the President's Message of the 2d of December, 1823, as was referred to said committee.

On motion of Mr. OWEN, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to examine and report to this House whether, in their opinion, the laws now in force authorize the exaction of duties on tonnage of barges, steamboats, and other craft, trading wholly on the waters of the Alabama and Tombigbee rivers; and whether, by the same laws, licensing and enrolling are also required; and further, if duties, and licensing, and enrolling, in such cases, are required by law, how far it is expedient to revive the 8th section of the act of the 1st May, 1802, and of extending the provisions thereof to the collection districts of Alabama.

On motion of Mr. WHITTLESLEY, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the necessity and expediency of erecting a lighthouse at some suitable site on the south shore of Lake Erie, east of Chagrin river and west of Conneaut creek.

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the legality of the charter granted to the Orleans Navigation Company, by the government of the late Territory of Orleans, on the 5th July, 1805, and the right of said company to exact and collect a tonnage duty on vessels navigating the river or bayou St. John, in the State of Louisiana; and, should the committee be of opinion that the same is illegal, that they report to this House such measures as they may deem most expedient and effectual to adopt to secure the free navigation of said river.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of disapproving, by law, of the act of the government of the late Territory of Orleans, incorporating the Orleans Navigation Company, passed on the 5th of July, 1805.

On motion of Mr. ANDREW STEVENSON, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the several laws relating to the districts of Bermuda Hundred and City Point, in the State of Virginia, as to permit ships or vessels arriving in ballast to make entry in the manner now provided by law, for vessels laden with goods, wares, and merchandise.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of discharging from their liability, either in whole or in part, the sureties of Walter Sheldon, deceased, late a district paymaster in the Army of the United States.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the public stock of the United States to be purchased and sold by the courts of the United States.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the propriety of enacting a law, explanatory to the treaty made between the United States and the Cherokee Indians, on the 8th of July, 1817, in such manner as shall authorize those holding reservations in land for life, with a reversion in fee simple, to their heirs, to make leases for a term of years of the same, without incurring a forfeiture of their estate for the want of personal residence.

The said resolution was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Committee on the Public Lands were directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President to cause a land office to be opened at some point near the route proposed for a canal, to connect the waters of Lake Michigan with the Illinois river, when he shall deem it expedient.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. FOOT in the Chair,) on the bill making provision for procuring the necessary surveys, estimates, &c., for roads and canals.

Mr. TRIMBLE having ceded his right to the floor—

Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose and said: In addressing the Committee upon this subject, he labored under no common share of embarrassment. The magnitude of the question itself, the ability and eloquence already evolved in the discussion; the relation in which I stand to a majority of my colleagues on this topic—all unite to increase the embarrassment which I feel in the discharge of the duty incumbent upon me. While these considerations give me, I trust, some claim to indulgence, they make a fearless discharge of that duty more necessary and imperative.

Can this Government construct such roads and canals as are necessary and proper to fulfil its Constitutional obligations? The solution of this question covers the whole range of the present discussion. It is a question of power—of implied power, conferred by that charter which alike marks our powers and our duties. The three great instruments of power given to this Confederation are, its Army, its Navy, and its right of taxation. The duties enjoined on it are, the common defence and general welfare. The first provides the means, the last indicates the ends to be attained. Its constructive power results from that grant in the Constitution to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect the mass of power expressly granted. The subject, then, presents itself to us from this point of view—Are roads and canals necessary and proper, in the full exertion of the powers conferred, in order to discharge the duties enjoined? Are they necessary and proper, as a means of providing, maintaining, and employing the Army and Navy of the United States? At the threshold of this inquiry, two objections, of a character apparently insuperable, have been presented by my colleagues, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR and Mr. A. STEVENSON.) The first of these gentlemen has told us that the right of establishing roads and canals involves the necessity of exclusive jurisdiction; that exclusive jurisdiction has been granted in certain enumerated cases, and that this enumeration is exclusive, in cases not enumerated. If the premises were here correct, the deduction would be irresistible. But, Mr. Chairman, is exclusive jurisdiction, in this Government, necessary for the exercise of this power? I apprehend that it is not. Exclusive jurisdiction has been granted over the District in which we hold our deliberations, and over such other territory, ceded with the assent of the States, for forts, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings. What is the effect of this exclusive jurisdiction? It necessarily carries with it the sole and absolute legislative powers to the full extent of that jurisdiction. It embraces, in its exercise, every subject that can be matter of legislative, executive, or judicial cognizance. The wise framers of the instrument under which we act, believed this power to be rightfully and safely vested in the United States, for the uses which have been expressly specified. The question recurs upon us, Is this right of exclusive jurisdiction necessary, in the construction of these roads and canals? Cannot this Government acquire and hold the right of property in the soil, while the jurisdiction over it is still reposed in the State governments? Numerous instances could be cited, in which the United States may exert a proprietary right, totally apart from its sovereign rights. And, this right being once acquired, what objection can arise in enacting such needful rules and regulations as tend to preserve it? This Confederation is expressly vested with authority to make all needful rules and regulations that may relate to the territory, or other property of the United States. Exclusive jurisdiction, and the right of property, are not inseparable. I can perceive no difficulty in exercising the control which the right of property gives to the one, and the exercise of jurisdiction by the other government. If there be a violation of any private right, or of any law relating to the whole circle of crimes and punishments, committed upon such soil, then the State claiming jurisdiction will necessarily take cognizance of such offences. Its code of laws supplies the rule to redress the wrong, and punish the delinquent. This municipal authority, to the extent retained, is sovereign on the part of the States, and I am unable to discern the least peril of colliding jurisdictions.

The other gentleman from Virginia (Mr. S.) denies to this Confederacy the right to acquire lands in the several States, and if such acquisition could be made, it must, he says, be held as one sovereign would hold lands in the territory of another. I dissent to both these propositions. Can gentlemen be serious in denying to this Government, created for such great purposes, a power which belongs to every corporate town, and to every turnpike company in the several States? This is not only one of the inherent attributes of its institution, but the fifth amendment to the Constitution recognises the right to take private property for public uses, connecting with that right the correlative obligation of making just compensation to its owner. Can this right of acquisition be construed to relate to personal property only? The United States have already expended many millions of its treasure in the purchase of lands. This right, by purchase, expands itself over the boundless territory washed by the waters of the Mississippi, now subdivided into several States. Is the title to these vast domains defective? Are the Representatives from these States intruders within this Hall? A large portion of territory was obtained by purchase from the State of Georgia—an instance which will forbid gentlemen from seeking refuge in the treaty-making power, to shun the force of these precedents.

I apprehend, sir, that this Government is not bound to hold its lands in the States, subject to all the conditions which one sovereign may impose on another. The two systems of government were designed to compose one harmonious and consistent whole, each moving in its appropriate sphere of action, and ministering to the common weal. If there be any proposition about which there should be no diversity of opinion, it is that, to the extent of the powers granted, this Government is supreme; the Constitution has so expressed it, and the State courts are positively required to observe and maintain its legitimate supremacy. But, are the State governments sovereign? The 10th section of the first article of the Constitution is filled with limitations upon the sovereignty of the States. I need not point to them—they are within the knowledge of all. And here let me take leave to add one further limitation—the local authorities are also controlled to the extent of all the means necessary and proper to carry into effect the delegated powers of this Government, be these means “municipal,” or otherwise. This limitation is the obvious result of that clause of the Constitution which claims for itself, and gives to its laws a supreme control. The conclusion seems to me inevitable, that this Government may acquire a proprietary right of soil, for national purposes, within the several States; that this right of property draws after it the power to make all needful rules and regulations affecting it, and that these powers may be rightfully exerted, independent on all local authority.

Congress can claim no other powers than such as are expressed, and those which are incident to the express grant. There is no language in this Constitution, as in the Articles of Confederation, to exclude implied powers; on the contrary, this class of powers is bestowed by positive words. The express powers are the result of express grant; those which are incidental must, from their character, necessarily be the result of legislative discretion, limited by the terms of the Constitution. No safer rule of construction can be furnished, than to interpret the words of the instrument in their plain and obvious sense, neither enlarged by a spirit of encroachment, nor checked by any unwise denial of the necessary powers to effect the great design of its creation. No constitution can do more than draw the general boundaries of the government to which it gives being. To mark the various divisions of its power, would have been a task endless and impracticable. Where, in this instrument, can be found a grant of express power, which does not necessarily require others of a character incidental and auxiliary? Powers that are vital to the existence of the Government, and without which it would be unworthy of the wisdom which created it, and unfitted to secure the welfare of the people. The security for the faithful performance of these powers will be found in the wisdom and virtue of those who are chosen to be the guardians of the public interest. It will be found in the language of the Constitution, which limits their exercise, and forbids usurpation; and if these should prove ineffectual safeguards, there remains the great conservative principle, which springs from the frequency of elections. So long as this power remains in the hands of the people, there is no danger of abuse. Jealous of their just rights, and possessed of an ample remedy, they will not forbear to employ it, when duty shall bid them to act.

I shall not seek to derive the power in question from that clause which relates to post offices and post roads. The argument of the honorable Speaker, and that of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) have done so much justice to this branch of the inquiry, as to make any effort on my part worse than idle. If I can satisfy the Committee that this is a necessary incident to the military and naval power of the United States, I flatter myself that I shall have accomplished all that duty requires. If the end be lawful, and within the legitimate purpose of the Constitution, it draws after it all the means necessary and proper to attain that end. If this be not true, then the language in which the Constitution itself is written has lost its meaning, and the government it creates a mockery upon the intentions of its framers.

Congress has power to provide and maintain armies and navies, as instruments necessary for the common defence—one of the great duties charged upon the Union. Connected with these, express power is granted to erect forts, arsenals, and dock yards. For what purpose are you to build forts? They suffice the purposes of defence, but they must be filled with troops, cannon, small arms, and all the munitions of war. The means of transporting these are just as necessary as the forts themselves. The road that conducts to the fort, is indispensable to its useful maintenance. Again, for the purpose of building a navy, you may erect dock yards. Can it be supposed, that all the vast variety of materiel for ship building could be growed, manufactured, and obtained, in the dock yard itself? Can these be had but by the means of transportation? Without roads and canals to your forts and dock yards, the purpose indicated by their establishment would be physically impracticable. The relation here, between the means and the end, is not only direct, immediate, and appropriate, but absolutely and indispensably necessary. Will such roads and canals be taken as part of the forts and dock yards, or as necessary to their existence? If the former, then the power belongs to that class which is conferred by express grant. If the latter, they are necessary and proper, and are classed with the incidental powers, by the plain letter of the Constitution.

But, it is said that, if the power exist to cut roads and canals for forts and dockyards, they must be limited by the necessity that creates them; and that, having created them for these uses, the power to create ceases, with the use in which they are employed. If the United States possess this power in any case, it obviates most of the difficulty offered to its exercise, in all cases; inasmuch as it develops the existence of this power, without involving exclusive jurisdiction, but carrying a right of property in the soil, and a consequent authority to enact all needful rules and regulations, in relation to that property.

Let us, however, Mr. Chairman, examine this question, so far as it is an incident to the aggregate military power of this Government. For what end is this power given, and for what purpose may it be rightfully employed? The Constitution supplies the answer; "for the common defence and general welfare." I shall not contend that this language was designed to infuse power into this Confederation, but its manifest intent is to impose an obligation. The duty which it enjoins is co-extensive with the entire limits of this expanded and expanding Union. Your armies, with all the circumstance of war, are to be marched and transported throughout the almost boundless extent of these States. The untrodden wilderness is to be traversed, not only by the footsteps of the soldier, but all the munitions of war must accompany him. What means are most plainly adapted to this end? Gentlemen have said that post roads were not necessary, on the part of this Government, because population precedes the necessity for post roads; and that highways will be provided, which suffice for post roads. But, can this be the case, in the exertion of the military power? The populated portions of our country are not the usual theatre of battles. The abode of civilization cannot be visited by the horrors of war until the frontier is passed. There often exists the strongest necessity to transport troops to the most remote quarter. The peace, the safety, and the lives of our people, frequently depend upon the rapidity of this transportation. As a mean to accomplish the end, to discharge the most sacred and positive duty required by the Constitution, roads and canals are strongly necessary. They are so, as a further means of promoting an economy of treasure and of blood. Can it be thought, that this necessity exists only in war? Sir, I know no power belonging to this Government, with which it is not as fully clothed in peace as in war. In war, when all the resources of the nation are necessary for its successful operation, is it practicable to commence and prosecute a system of internal improvements? Peace is the season of preparation. In war, all our means are wanted to conduct us in safety through its perils. If that be the only period in which it is Constitutional to create military roads, it is alike the period when it is utterly impracticable, and if this argument be just, it amounts to a total denial of all authority over this subject. A state of war renders it impracticable, although then admitted to be Constitutional; in peace, it is alone practicable—but, according to this argument, it is then unconstitutional. The effect of this mode of construction is to demand duties, and deny, at the same moment, the means of discharging them. As an incident to the military power, they are eminently useful. They augment the safety of the nation at home, and increase its respect abroad. In this view, public confidence is enhanced, while foreign nations are counselled to respect a people, at all times ready to protect themselves; they tend to promote economy in the various employment and expenditure of the whole military power of the Union. By attaining these great objects, our independence, honor, and prosperity, are defended and secured; and, if so, can there exist a rational doubt that they are necessary and proper in providing for the common defence of the whole United States, and are therefore, Constitutional?

I beg leave to offer a further view of this question. The experience of past ages, and the counsels of our own constitutions, instruct us, that the chief defence of a free people must rest upon its militia. Trained to arms, and conversant with their duties, they are the defenders of our liberties, not only against external invasion, but against those internal commotions, the consequences of unprincipled ambition. To the assaults of a naval enemy, a large portion of our country is peculiarly vulnerable. If we rely upon the militia as an arm of defence, it behooves us to provide the facilities of rapid transportation to each assailable point. Such an enemy will be always clothed with a capacity to fly or fight, as his inclinations may direct. Your means of resistance must eminently depend upon the promptness which you can gather your forces around him. Should you not provide these facilities, the Government must station regular troops at the numberless assailable points. Apart from the vast expense of such a military establishment, I shudder for the dangers with which it would encompass the liberties of the people. Standing armies have always been viewed as engines of despotism, and as hostile to the existence of all free institutions. The kindred affections, by which all its parts are tied together, the attachment to its chief, which is locked up in the arms of military discipline, the esprit du corps, which is its strongest sentiment, united with that principle which counsels man to feel power while he forgets right, all combine to fill the public mind with alarm and with jealousy towards such establishments.

Several gentlemen, who have participated in the debate, admit the incidental powers, and have given us a rule of construction which limits them, by a direct, immediate, and appropriate relation to the end designed; and yet, when they apply this rule, its interpretation denies a choice of all the means to attain the end. The Constitution never intended to deny to Congress a choice of means. Is the end legitimate? Is it plainly and distinctly within the scope of the Constitution? Then all the incidents necessary and proper become the subject of legislative discretion. The Constitution confers on Congress the power to call forth the militia, in order to suppress insurrection, repel invasion, and execute the laws. Here the end is expressly declared, and the means is expressly indicated; and yet, I presume, none will deny that we have power to execute our laws by other instruments than the militia; that we may suppress insurrections by the regular army, or that we may employ the same force to repel invasion. If such constructions of gentlemen be correct, we should be compelled to rely exclusively upon that mean which the Constitution directs to attain the end to which it points. If these walls could speak, or rather if the foundation of this building could instruct us by its warning voice, we might be counselled of the dangerous character of such interpretations of the Constitution.

The alarm expressed in relation to "State rights," is, to my mind, entirely fallacious. The power sought to be exerted, is only seen and felt in the improving hand of the National Government over the territories of the States. It invades no right—it trenches upon no jurisdiction—it is only known in the "blessings it confers." The National Government can usurp no jurisdiction over the States, and all the enactments of Congress upon this subject, are dependent on the States for their execution. The local jurisdiction is not only unimpaired, but this dependence of the one Government upon the other, to the extent of that dependence, enlarges the power of the States, and diminishes that of the Union.

The time was, when it became necessary to augment the powers of the States to their utmost limits, by enlarged rules of construction. A spirit of encroachment had found its way into the Administration of the Confederacy, which many of our wisest heads and purest hearts believed to threaten the preservation of popular government. The freedom of the press was trammelled and the liberty of speech denied. It was in the State governments alone, that these rights were fully possessed. Upon their ramparts the banner of resistance was planted; and through their agency a revolution of public sentiment was achieved, which allayed the fears of the people, and stayed the restless march of power. In the ardor of patriotic devotion, and in the zeal which a glorious cause inspired, it is not matter of surprise, that a sphere of action should be allotted to the States, which might be incompatible with the full exertion of all the functions of the confederated government. The events of the late war supply us with some monitory lessons upon this subject. These cannot be forgotten; some of them are traced in blood, and others will long remain as monuments of human error, and of the fallacy of those errors where "reason is left free to combat them." Does the honorable member from Vermont recollect that, under the pretext of State rights, the Governor and Captain General of his own State invoked his militia, by proclamation, to abandon the service of the United States, at the very moment a powerful foe was endeavoring to devastate our northern frontier, and to whelm it in the horrors of war? Those patriot yeomanry wear the honors of repelling with scorn and indignation this unworthy invitation? What but those rules of rigid construction supplied some of the Northern members of this Confederacy, with the hollow pretence of State rights, to strip the national arm of some of the most salutary powers? Nor was this all; measures were concerted, to arrest and divert the revenue of the nation; a convention of delegates assembled, whose agents were deputed to beard the Government in the moment of its greatest extremity; to paralyze the measures of resistance, and to proclaim its impotence to an arrogant and insulting foe, who openly threatened to lay waste every assailable point; the camp itself became the forum of Constitutional exposition; no one who cherishes an exulting pride in the glory of his country, or that has a heart to feel for its calamities, can forget the scene before Queenstown. A gallant chief conducted our undisciplined troops into the enemy's country. Victory had already perched upon our standard, when the co-operating aid of expected reinforcements was suddenly checked by Constitutional difficulties. Disasters speedily clustered over our hopes, and a nation's honor wept and blushed over the wasted blood of our people, and the sullied lustre of our arms. A construction widely different was given by the people of the West, and as different was the result. They sought the foe, they fought and conquered him; triumph sat upon their brow, and the joy of victory gladdened a nation's heart. A practical illustration is here presented of these two systems of Constitutional construction.

It is time to adopt just and wholesome principles of interpretation. I have no pleasure in referring to instances of delinquency, nor should I have done so, but for the anxious fears which gentlemen express for the rights of the States, and an apprehension of a departure from those rules of construction which they deem sacred. For the preservation of those rights, I feel a solicitude as deep and anxious as any member here. While I cherish this sentiment, I cannot be insensible to the dangers of their encroachment. Some of the events to which I have alluded give me cause to fear, that, in times of public trouble, there is greater danger of anarchy among the members of this confederation, than of tyranny in its head.

The agency of the States in the organic establishment of this Government must at all times give them great power. Let the States withhold from the Union its means of providing a Senate and Executive, and this Government must at once moulder in its ruins. So long as each is duly awake to a sense of the blessings this Union confers, and of the obligations which it imposes, I fear no danger—the system will continue one harmonious and consistent whole. When political corruptions shall have confounded these obligations, it will be in vain that we seek safety in the written forms of the Constitution—it needs not a "prophet's fire" to foretell its dissolution. Our best security is to be found in the virtue and intelligence of the people. Jealous of their rights, and rich in this possession, I ask no pledge but their unceasing vigilance.

I must beg leave, in closing, to express my regret that a gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEWART) should have deemed this a fit occasion to complain of what he considers the Virginia principles of construction. Sir, it is to these principles that this Union is eminently indebted. They gave being to your Constitution, and a shield to your national independence. They stayed the wild career of a mad and faithless Administration, and arrested the giant strides of ambition. They cherished that love of country which displayed its generous and fearless spirit in every theatre where danger menaced, or where duty summoned. They gave to liberty a resting place among us, and diffused its blessings through this land. They teach us to promote public prosperity, to cherish kindred sympathies, to cement the bonds of union, to perpetuate these blessings to posterity. And, believing that this bill may minister to these beneficent purposes, I shall cordially give it my support.

When Mr. BARBOUR had concluded—

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said, that the gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) would see, from the speech of his colleague (Mr. J. S. BARBOUR) who had just sat down, that with regard to the Constitutional doctrines which he had considered as peculiarly Virginian, there was somewhat of the same diversity in Virginia as in other States; and he ought to have recollected that the same doctrines had been zealously supported by one gentleman from his own State, (Mr. WOOD,) and another from Vermont, (Mr. MALLARY.) He had also characterized the arguments brought to support a rigid construction of the Constitution as Virginia metaphysics, and it was not the first time that the remark had been made in that House. But if any blame was to be attached to letting the argument turn on mere political abstractions, the other side must come in for their full share, as they had drawn the nicest distinctions between municipal powers, and national and political and various other species of powers. Mr. T. said he should not follow their example, both because he had no talent for that species of reasoning, and because, after the proposition is established that the power in question is municipal or national, or of any other particular class, nothing is gained in the argument, and the parties are still left to differ about the meaning of the terms. He should keep clear of these refinements, and endeavor to adhere, in the discussion, to the dictates of plain common sense. And, although he did not promise himself that he should change a single vote in the Committee, it was possible that what he might say might have some effect elsewhere; and, though it may fail to convince, it might excite some trains of thought that may be improved by others possessed of greater powers than his own.

Mr. T. said he was sorry that so much time had been expended in this debate to prove the advantages of roads and canals. This was surely unnecessary in the present day. A large portion of the labor of every country is expended, not in producing useful commodities, but in conveying them from the parts where they are redundant to those where they are wanted; and the saving in this labor of transportation, afforded by roads and canals, often makes the difference between a rich and a poor country. He was as sensible of their advantages as any one, and had been always ready to contribute his feeble aid in imparting them to the State of which he was a Representative. But he was opposed to the system of which the present bill proposed to lay the foundation, not only because it was beyond the sphere of the powers confided to us by the Constitution, but because he thought it of dangerous political tendency, with regard to the relative powers of the General and State Governments, and unwise as a measure of national economy.

Mr. T. said he did not propose to say much on the constitutionality of the bill, as that branch of the subject had been already very fully and ably discussed. He should, however, trouble the Committee with some remarks on the clause respecting post offices and post roads, in the examination of which, he hoped he should be excused for indulging in verbal criticism. In doing so, he should but follow the example of the Speaker—and, indeed, when the meaning of a clause in the Constitution turns on a single word, as in this case, and its meaning is disputed, there is no other mode of ascertaining the meaning of that instrument. He thought the meaning could be missed only by too much subtlety and refinement, as many who might have found gold, if they had confined themselves to the surface, had lost it by searching too deep for it. The Speaker disclaims all other sources of the power to make roads and canals, than is to be found in this clause. If it is here, it is given by the word establish. He says, establish means to originate and create, rather than to adopt or designate. I, in part, agree with him, said Mr. T.; but it often signifies neither the one nor the other. The simple import of the word is, to give stability to, and the object thus made stable, may originate at the same time, or it may not. Mr. T. here gave several illustrations of the meaning of the word, in all of which, it signified to give stability of some kind—of truth, or certainty, or law. In no case of legislation does it import a physical act, but merely to give to some subject the stability of law. But, if it be admitted that it is synonymous with make or create, it would not advance the purposes of the argument, as it would simply mean, to create by legislative enactment.

Nor has the Speaker adverted to the difference between establishing a road and a post road. The State might make a road, while the act of Congress made the post road, which distinction Mr. T. further illustrated by examples. If any doubt, said he, exists on this subject, the sense in which the word has been invariably used by the Legislature, from the origin of the Government, ought to be considered as the correct one; and our statute book is filled with instances of post roads that have been established, though no roads have been made. But, again, Mr. Chairman, the word establish has not a stronger signification than the words abolish or discontinue, which are used in contradistinction to it; and yet, when we speak of discontinuing a post road, no one considers it as stopping up, or even discontinuing, the road itself, but merely as depriving it of the property of being the channel of conveyance for the mail, which the law had imparted to it; and, in like manner, to establish a post road is nothing more than to give to a road the same property.

Mr. T. said that, in expounding the Constitution, he had made it a rule, ever since he had had a seat on that floor, to avoid refinements of construction as much as possible, and to understand the language as it was used by persons of plain common sense; and this for two reasons—one was, that its wise framers no doubt intended that the words of an instrument which was made in the name of the people, and meant to act on the people, should be taken in their popular signification; and another was, because, on all controverted questions about the Constitution, the people, from whom all power is derived, must be, at their elections, if no where else, its final arbiters and expounders. Let us then apply this rule of construction. What are the words that would have been probably used if the Constitution had meant to give the power contended for? These would have been make or construct, and not establish; and let me ask, if one was to inquire who established a particular post road, would the inquiry be understood to apply to the construction of the road itself, or to the property or quality which the law had imparted to it? Would any one think of the spades and shovels by which the road was made, or merely of the Legislature which had converted it into a mail route?

But again, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., the power of constructing roads, insisted on by the advocates of this bill, is a much greater power than that of making them the channels of conveying the mail. It is greater in the cost of executing it, and greater in its bearings and consequences. A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEWART) has told us, that the expense of transporting the mail on the Cumberland road was formerly sixty dollars per mile, (now reduced to thirty,) but the cost of constructing it has been, I believe, upwards of ten thousand per mile, the interest of which is ten times the cost of transporting the mail. Now, supposing the words to be ambiguous in their meaning, is it reasonable to construe them to give the larger power, when the smaller will satisfy the words, and when the framers of the Constitution could so easily have used the unequivocal language of making or constructing roads, if it had been their intention to give such power?

H. OF R.

Surveys for Roads and Canals.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. T. then remarked, that perhaps he had said more than was necessary to show that this clause did not specifically give the power to construct roads, as nearly all the gentlemen who had followed the Speaker had virtually given up this point by deriving the power from some other part of the Constitution. But some, who could not persuade themselves it could be found in the right to establish post roads, think that it may be found in that clause which gives all powers that are necessary and proper for carrying the specific powers into execution; and that the power to construct roads is a necessary power to give effect to the power of establishing post roads, in the limited sense in which we understand it. But, said Mr. T., the Constitution was made for men and things as they are, not as they possibly might be. It did not mean to provide for extreme and highly improbable cases, and I entirely concur with the Speaker, that it is unfair to test the Constitution by remote possibilities. Those who framed it knew that wherever there were people there were roads; that these must, necessarily, go hand in hand with settlement and population; that their own convenience, their necessities, would compel them to make roads to their ordinary markets, their courthouses, their places of worship. Sir, our whole territory is intersected with roads, and there is not, perhaps, a square of three miles in the United States, having a population of ten persons on it, in which there is not a road sufficient for the transportation of the mail. Nothing, then, can be more unnecessary than such a power in Congress; and when we remember with what a cautious and jealous spirit power was doled out to the General Government by the States, it may fairly be presumed that, if they had imagined the case in which the General Government had wanted a road in opposition to the wishes of the State through which it was to pass, they would not have granted the power. Sir, no questions excite more interest, or are litigated with more warmth, than disputes about roads. In Virginia, contests concerning them are often carried on through all the courts from the highest to the lowest; and the question is not there, as it commonly is in more thickly settled countries, who shall have a road near him, but who shall get rid of it, because it often imposes on the landholder the burden of additional fencing. When they found that the exercise of a jurisdiction by their own courts excited so much heart-burning and contention among the people, it is one of the last powers they would have surrendered to a Government that was new, and in a manner foreign to them. Sir, in such extreme cases as have been supposed to show the necessity of this power, we must always rely on the discretion and good sense of those on whom the Constitution was intended to operate, and it was no more necessary to provide for them on this subject, than it was to provide for compelling the States to choose Senators or Electors. They will do so for their own sakes, and the moment a law for that purpose becomes necessary, it ceases to have operation, and the Government becomes dissolved. Against these remote contingencies, the good sense and good feelings of the people are the only security.

But, it has been said, that, if Congress do not possess the power of making roads, a State may obstruct the mail when it pleases. But, can any thing be more improbable than the supposition that the people will deny themselves the convenience and benefits of the mail, of hearing from distant friends, of corresponding on business, of gratifying their curiosity, for the mere purpose of thwarting the General Government? Sir, in the times of the most violent party spirit, in the hottest opposition that the Government has ever experienced, no one, not even the Hartford Convention, would have purposely given any obstructions to the mail. They were all anxious to get the news; and it is absurd (if so indecorous an expression may be allowed) to suppose that men are to act against their most natural feelings and their plainest interests. If, however, there should be occasional instances of wilful obstruction, the law may act on the individual, and that affords sufficient security to the interests of the General Government.

Mr. T. said it was unnecessary to take up further time on this clause; he would, however, before he dismissed it, make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) who had supported the Speaker's construction of this clause. In one particular, said T., I agree with him. If, to establish, means to create, I admit that he has established the principle he insists on; for, it is not to be found in the Constitution. But this is a sense in which I believe few will concur with us.

Mr. T. now adverted to the power of regulating commerce, from which the gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) derived the power of constructing roads, and said, that he should not attempt to answer the ingenious arguments of that gentleman, both because he had not found leisure to investigate this branch of the subject, and because he anticipated a full and satisfactory answer to it, from one of his colleagues, who would follow him in the debate. He would, however, remark, that, if that gentleman had trusted less to political abstractions and technical distinctions about the different species of power, and consulted the good sense for which he is so distinguished, he would have been conducted to very different conclusions. He had given an extent of signification to the word "regulate," which was justified neither by the import of the word itself, by the history of the Constitution, nor by other parts of that instrument.

Mr. T. said he would call the attention of the gentleman from Delaware, to a clause that had not been adverted to in debate, and would appeal to his candor, whether it did not present a serious difficulty to his construction of the Constitution. That gentleman derives the right to make roads, from the right to regulate the internal commerce between the States, by land as well as by water; but a clause in the 9th section of the 1st article, prohibits Congress from making any discrimination in favor of the ports of one State, over those of another. And it is fair to presume, that they might have given such preference, but for the prohibition. Now, if the gentleman from Delaware is right, that we have the right of regulating internal commerce between the States, it follows, that Congress may make unjust discrimination in the interior of the country, which they are restrained from making at the ports. There can be no reason for this distinction. The States meant to secure to themselves perfect equality, on this delicate and important subject. But, to what purpose forbid discrimination at the ports, if it could be made on roads and canals? The only answer that can be given is, that the commerce on the latter was never contemplated, and the coasting trade was all that was intended by the trade between the States. The gentleman from Delaware also said, that if Congress, under its express power to regulate commerce among the States, had not also the power to facilitate it, by making roads and canals, it would be in the power of any State to obstruct the trade between other States, which passed through it; but there was sufficient protection against this mischief, in that clause of the Constitution which secures to the citizens of one State the privileges of every other, taken along with that regard which every State may be expected to have to its interests. The evil was too remote and improbable, to have made the power contended for, necessary, or to furnish any argument for its existence.

As to the power of Congress to make war, to raise and support armies, Mr. T. said, he could not see how that could be made to give the power to adopt a system of internal improvement. It is true, it may be occasionally necessary to make a road or canal to a fort or an arsenal, but in this case, the road or canal is a mere appendage to the military work. It is, in fact, a part of the work itself. Yet that circumstance can no more give a power to make roads or canals over the whole Union, than to extend any other operation which the Government may find it convenient to carry on within the limits of their exclusive jurisdiction. Such a power cannot be necessary to the exercise of the military power, as we have raised and supported armies in two wars, without making roads and canals; nor has any nation in Europe found the direct exercise of this power, though it is indubitably possessed, essential to its military operations, except in the way that it has been exercised here during the temporary exigencies of war.

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., if we had this power, there seems to me to be strong reasons why we should not exercise it. And I would ask the further patience of the Committee, while I offer some objections to the bill which seem to me to deserve their serious consideration. It is very clear, that, if we engage in a general system of internal improvement, it will bring with it an extensive exercise of internal legislation. Large sums of money must be drawn from the people, and again expended in the construction of roads and canals. It must take a good deal, also, to keep them in repair, as every rain that falls, and every frost does them more or less of injury. The construction and superintendence of these public works will require a long train of officers; for it is conceded that the United States are, themselves, to conduct roads and canals, and not by the agency of incorporated companies—and you can act only by means of delegated power. There must also be new tribunals erected to enforce the numerous contracts which the system implies, and to punish the injuries to which the works will be exposed, as the State courts refuse to exercise jurisdiction under your laws. All this apparatus must occasion a prodigious accession to the power and influence of the General Government, and especially to the Executive branch of it. Mr. Chairman, our system of Government is admirably adapted to our circumstances. No other could secure the blessings of civil liberty to so extensive a territory, with such diversified interests. But it is evident that its preservation depends upon some very delicate circumstances, which are necessary to maintain the just equilibrium between the power of the General Government and that of the States. It is a problem yet to be solved, to which of the two opposite dangers, of consolidation and disunion, we are most exposed. I know that some of the most patriotic and far-sighted men in the nation have differed on this question. In forming our opinion on it, we can draw no lights from history, and have to rely solely on our own powers of reflection and sagacity. But whatever may have been the relative strength of the two powers at the adoption of the Constitution, there is an obvious cause for the continual increase in the power of the General Government to be found in the multiplication of the States. As the number of these increases, the relative weight of each proportionally diminishes. Thus Virginia, when the General Government first went into operation, was about one-sixth of the Union, now she is not more than one-tenth. Virginia and Maryland together have not more relative weight than Virginia had alone. But it is clear that the same power, divided between two States, cannot act with the same effect as when it is united in one; and that they are not likely to act as efficiently in opposing the measures of the General Government, either by means of their Representatives, or by operating on public opinion. Even if we suppose them actuated by the same views, and co-operating in the same course of opposition, still the jealousies and dissensions of allies are proverbial, and are founded in the strongest principles of our nature. And whether the object of the General Government be to pass a sedition law, to repeal a judiciary law, to incorporate a bank, or to adopt a system of roads and canals, the opposition which the States may be disposed to make to these measures, as unconstitutional, must be weakened by dividing among the several States the powers which had been previously possessed by one. In that case, the causes of dissension may be as strong as the motives to union. It is thus, Mr. Chairman, as it seems to me, that the power of the General Government is continually increasing.

But perhaps it may be said that this effect of the addition of new States was foreseen, and taken into account by the framers of the Constitution. But this could not have been the case. When the Constitution was adopted, the Mississippi was our boundary, and the acquisition of that extensive and fertile country west of it, which is to have so much effect in altering the relative weight of any one State, was at that time never dreamt of. Mr. T. here remarked, that New York presented a case directly opposite to that of Virginia. She had once but one-tenth of the political power of the Union, and she now has one-sixth. But the last census shows that this increase, in her relative strength, cannot go on. It has received little accession in the last ten years, as 28 members on this floor bear nearly the same proportion to 185, as her present number 34 bears to 213; and I may venture to predict that in ten years more, or, if not in ten, in twenty, as the vast and fertile valley of the Mississippi fills up with the numbers it is one day destined to support, her proportionate weight in the Union will begin to diminish, though her actual numbers may go on increasing. My colleague, said Mr. T., who has just sat down, has adverted to the opposition made to the General Government during the late war—and this furnishes me with another illustration. Sir, if the State of Maine had been then separated from Massachusetts, it can scarcely be doubted that her weight, instead of being added to the opposition, would have been thrown into the scale of the General Government. She would have operated as an antagonist power to her parent State, and rendered her efforts harmless.

Nor is this all. The relative powers between the Representative and the Executive branches of this Government are of little less importance than that between the General and the State Governments. The appointment of so many officers, and the establishment of so many courts, as a general system of internal improvement supposes, must make a very great addition to the power and patronage of the Executive, and materially affect that equipoise which the Constitution intended. Nothing would be more likely to affect the independence of this House, than the circumstance that every member had in his district from fifty to an hundred persons holding lucrative offices, at the pleasure of the President, who would be always ready to oppose him when he opposed the Executive. Sir, said Mr. T., to judge of this influence, let us look into the history of the National Legislature, and without wishing to be understood as alluding to the present time, or to any individuals, I will venture to say, that the most complaisant supporters of the present Administration will be found to have come from the seaports, where there are collectors and tide-waiters and others, holding offices at the pleasure of the Executive. There will no doubt be found exceptions, but such is the general rule; and if this has been the effect already, what will it be when the President of the United States shall be the Chief Magistrate of fifty or an hundred millions of people? The lustre of the office of President increases, not in proportion to the increase of patronage, but in a much higher ratio. It is with this, as with the diamond—double the quantity may give ten times the value. When the accessions of power and dignity to the Executive of the United States must necessarily be so great, and when they have such an imposing effect on the minds of men, ought we not to be very cautious how we increase them?

But, said Mr. T., gentlemen seem to have taken it for granted, that the General Government is more able to effect internal improvements than the several States. But I think the proposed system as unwise on the score of national economy, as it is mischievous in its political tendency. The power of the General Government to improve the whole Union is not greater than that of each State to improve its own territory. Sir, if this system is adopted, the money drawn from the community appropriated to its execution, will be fairly distributed among the several States, or it will not. If we suppose unfairly, that will be a fruitful cause of jealousy and discontent, and furnishes a sufficient objection to the measure. But, if it is to be distributed in just proportion, there can be no advantage to the several States, for the whole can be but equal to all its parts. Thus, if you expend half a million in the State of Virginia, which you had previously drawn from the people of Virginia, wherein is she a gainer by the operation? Nor can the General Government procure that minute and accurate local information which is required by the system, as easily as the States. But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., I consider any plan of making roads and canals by the direct agency of the Government, as unwise. It takes away the best security against rash and unprofitable schemes of improvement. The sagacity of individual self-interest, is essential to guard against the waste of the national capital. There are several monuments of this danger in Europe. If my memory does not deceive me, one is afforded by Spain, and another in the north of Europe, in which, after the respective Governments had expended millions in attempting some improvement of navigation, the works were found to be useless. Nor let it be supposed that we are exempt from a similar danger. We may all remember that, after two or three hundred thousand dollars were expended in fortifying the battery of New York, it was discovered that the work was of no value as a national defence, and we gave it back to the State, without being able to get paid for the value of the materials. Such an error as this was less likely to have been committed by a State, and still less by an individual. If we engage in this magnificent scheme of internal improvement, must we not always be liable to be deceived and misled, when our local knowledge in our extensive country, must be so imperfect, and when so many will be interested in making misrepresentations? Sir, let it be known that the twenty millions, which was the sum recommended by Mr. Gallatin, are provided for internal improvement, and, my life for it, this city will swarm with hundreds of projectors, with their maps and plans, beautifully illuminated, electioneering for business; and as they would succeed according to their address, and means of conciliating favor, the result would be, that we should have roads without travellers, and canals without navigation, and perhaps without water.

Sir, said Mr. T., gentlemen may object that New York has furnished an example that a Government is not unfit to execute these great undertakings. It is true that New York has achieved a splendid work at her own expense—but he was not sure that a private company would not have executed it at a less cost. Sir, said Mr. T., I wish not to undervalue the merit to which New York is entitled for her great Western Canal. I thank her for furnishing so conclusive a proof that this bill is unnecessary; but let not gentlemen from that State be startled if I yet express a doubt whether that great work was not premature; I know that it is of prodigious benefit to those who live near it; but still, it be may questioned, whether it was precisely the most advantageous mode in which the capital of the State could be expended. The cost of the canal has been, I understand, about six millions, the annual interest on which is three hundred thousand dollars. Now, I believe, the amount of tolls last year, was but one hundred thousand dollars, from which are to be deducted the cost of management and repairs, leaving, probably, little more than an interest of about one and a half per cent.

And this, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. T., brings me to notice the remark of the gentleman who introduced this bill, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) who, aware of the objections that would arise from the small profit offered by some of the projected canals, said, that a canal may be profitable to the community, though it may not be so to the stockholders. This proposition is sometimes true, but it must be received with much allowance and caution. It is true, where tolls are not as great as the saving in the labor of transportation would justify. But, wherever this saving of labor is not sufficient to yield a profit as well to those who make the canal as to those who use it, we may safely pronounce that a country is not ripe for it.

Great stress was laid by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, on the canals of England. But, Mr. T. said, he thought their example might have furnished that gentleman with a stronger argument against the policy of the system he recommended, than in its favor. It is not enough for him to rely on the superior cheapness of water over land carriage. Sir, the construction of a canal may be a good or a bad thing, according to circumstances. It is very advantageous in a rich and thickly settled country to exchange the surplus products of the different parts, and to relieve their reciprocal wants; but in a country that is poor, and thinly settled, and passing through barren mountains, in which there is nothing to exchange, it would be a mere waste of the national capital. Of the four thousand miles of canal of which England can boast, and the eighty or an hundred thousand miles of road, if she has so many, I believe I am warranted in saying, not one mile was ever made by the Government. Their turnpike roads and canals are always made by joint stock companies, and whenever one would be really beneficial, individual capital and enterprise are always found ready to engage in the undertaking. And can it be supposed, if the system now proposed was a good one, that that Government, which so well understands its interests, especially its commercial interests, would not have discovered its advantages?

It may, however, be objected that, from the redundancy of private wealth and capital, in that country, their system of making roads and canals, by incorporated companies, is easy and proper, while here, from the scarcity of capital, it is impracticable. But, so long, Mr. Chairman, as your Government can borrow money at five per cent., and your bank stocks yield an annual profit of but six or seven per cent., there will be no difficulty in finding men ready to undertake any road or canal that will yield something like the same interest. It is to no purpose to say that the natural interest of money is higher in this country than it is in England—for, be that natural interest what it may, whether you suppose it six, eight, or ten per cent., if your road or canal do not afford that profit, it shows that the country is not ripe for that undertaking, and that the money required to execute it, will find some more profitable employment, if left in the hands of the people. Let, however, any road or canal be proposed, whose profit will repay the cost, according to the standard of the country; and, be assured, sir, there will be no difficulty in procuring the money to execute it.

The advocates for the system of internal improvement insist that the Constitutional power of the States is not sufficient to execute those great works, in which the interests of several States, or perhaps of the whole nation, are involved. But there is no difficulty on this subject, whether the proposed road or canal passes through one State or many. It has been repeatedly stated, in the course of the debate, that two or more States cannot enter into a compact, but the prohibition in the Constitution extends only to treaties. The 2d clause of the 10th section 1st article of the Constitution expressly recognises their right to make compacts with the consent of Congress, and it can hardly be supposed, that if they wished to enter into a compact for the purpose of making a canal, Congress would refuse its consent. But, if you were to refuse, they may act independently of you. They can effect their object by concurrent acts of their own Legislatures. On this subject, I do not speak from speculation, but from actual history. The State of which I am a Representative, united with the State of North Carolina to improve the navigation of the Roanoke, and by concurrent Legislative acts, without asking your consent, they incorporated a joint stock company, which has lately accomplished its objects. The States of Maryland and Virginia have in the same manner united in making the Potomac Canal.

Mr. T. said that, before he sat down, he would call the attention of the Committee to the celebrated report of Mr. Gallatin, on which some of the advocates of this bill had so much relied. It would appear that the power which they now deem so clear, it was then taken for granted, Congress did not possess, (and here he read a passage from the report.) He thought this ought to produce in their minds some doubts whether they really possessed this power. But, if we had the power, and no dangers were to be apprehended to the just equilibrium which ought to exist among the different branches of our complex system of Government, still the example of England ought to teach us that the proposed plan of making roads and canals is not a wise one. He had much more to say, but he had already trespassed too long on the patience of the Committee. He hoped the Committee might be induced to take some of his suggestions into consideration; and he begged them to remember that our legislation at the present time went far to give to our Government its future character; that this nation was, as yet, comparatively in its infancy, and "as the twig is bent the tree's inclined."

Mr. RIVES followed Mr. TUCKER on the same side; and, having made some progress in his speech, gave way at 4 o'clock for a motion to rise, when the Committee obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, February 4.

Mr. McCox, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Joshua Bennett, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. VINTON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred, on the 12th ultimo, the memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Arkansas, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill concerning pre-emption rights in the Territory of Arkansas; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of all contracts made by the War Department in the year 1823; which were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanying a statement exhibiting the duties accruing on merchandise imported, and drawback payable on merchandise exported, during the years 1820, 1821, and 1822; which was also laid on the table.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. COCKE, (calling for certain information respecting the Pea Patch,) was called up, and adopted.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the bill for issuing a register to the brig William, of New York, was taken up.

Mr. N. read the report on which the bill was founded.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, called for the reading of the documents.

[This vessel had a British register, was stranded, got off, again sunk, was raised, and brought into the port of New York, and there underwent such repairs as made her virtually a new vessel; and by the British navigation laws had, in consequence, forfeited her register.]

A conversation arose on this subject, in which Messrs. NEWTON and CAMBRELENG advocated, and Messrs. FOOT, COCKE, and McLANE, opposed the passage of the bill to a third reading; and, on motion of Mr. McLANE, it was laid on the table.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill making provision for surveys, &c., on roads and canals.

Mr. RIVES said if the importance of any question can give it a claim to attention, none is more worthy of profound consideration than the one now under discussion. It is, in the first place, a question of Constitutional right, involving the true interpretation of that instrument, from which we derive our existence as an independent member of the Government, and to which we are bound, by the highest obligations, to conform to our legislative conduct. But this, although the most important aspect which any subject can assume, under a limited Constitution, is not the only interest which belongs to the present question. Its decision must have a pervading influence upon the future policy of the country. If that decision should be in favor of the power contended for by the advocates of the bill, it will become the foundation of a system of legislation which I cannot regard otherwise than as inauspicious to the liberties and dangerous to the best interests of the nation. Under these impressions, incompetent as I am to do justice to the subject, or in any degree to match the ability which has been so conspicuously exhibited in its discussion, I am yet urged by a sense of duty to contribute the small mite of my humble exertions in defence of what I deem the cause of the Constitution, and the principles of sound policy. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that, in investigations of this sort, general reasonings from the spirit of the Constitution are not absolutely conclusive. The ultimate inquiry must be, what the framers of the Constitution have done, as evidenced by the instrument itself, rather than what they intended to do. But if we can ascertain what was the leading intention by which they were guided, in organizing the powers of the Government, a strong presumption arises that they have done nothing inconsistent with that intention. What, then, permit me to ask, was the cardinal principle which directed the Convention in the execution of their great work? It was this: to transfer to the care of the General Government those objects only in which all the States have a common interest, leaving those in which the States have separate and peculiar interests to be provided for by their own domestic governments; and this rule applies alike to every species of federal power, whether it be external or municipal. In pursuance of this principle, the General Government was charged with the question of peace or war, the regulation of commerce, the conduct of negotiations, and the various other objects connected with our foreign relations. In these all the States have but one interest, and that, emphatically, a national interest. So, likewise, with regard to that class of powers granted to Congress, which operate internally, such as the powers to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, to organize a federal judiciary, to establish a common standard of weights and measures, and to regulate the national currency. All the States stand precisely in the same relation to these powers, and are affected in the same manner, by the exercise of them, in their social and civil transactions. But this is not, and cannot be the case with internal improvements. They affect parts, and not the whole, of the Confederacy. They are, from a physical necessity, local in their situation, and local in their influence and their benefits. Take the most extended object of internal improvement, the projected road, for example, from Maine to New Orleans, or, if you please, the navigation of the waters of the Mississippi, in which the honorable Speaker has said twelve States and two Territories are interested, still, comprehensive and important as these schemes of improvement undoubtedly are, they are limited, in their advantages, to particular States, and the rest of the Union has no interest in them. They are, therefore, not such objects of common interest to all the States, as the Constitution intended to transfer to the General Government.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

H. OF R.

But here we are met by the argument of the honorable Speaker, that there is an intermediate class of objects, affecting more than one State, and yet not extending to all the States, which require the united means of a Confederacy to execute them, and the only Confederacy which can now legitimately exist for such a purpose, is that of the Union; because the Constitution prohibits one State from entering into compacts or agreements with another State. The honorable gentleman will excuse me for saying that this argument is founded on a mistake of the actual provisions of the Constitution. The Constitution does not prohibit compacts between the States, but merely restrains the States from entering into such compacts, without the consent of Congress. The consent of Congress is required, as a necessary check to prevent the States from forming combinations hostile to the Union, or dangerous to its peace and safety; but where any number of the States desire to enter into arrangements with each other, for the accomplishment of some beneficial object, in which they have a common interest, it never could have been supposed or intended that the consent of Congress would be withheld. The States, in such cases, are still left at liberty to unite their resources, by entering into compacts with each other, subject only to the reasonable control of Congress; and this privilege was no doubt reserved to them with an express view to the very class of objects now in question, which concern two or more members of the Confederacy, but yet do not possess such a character of universal national interest as to bring them within the legitimate sphere of the government of the whole.

The honorable Speaker, in the course of his argument, laid down a position, which he seemed to consider entirely decisive of the present question. Adverting to the distinction between the Articles of Confederation and our present Constitution, and remarking that, under the former, the General Government, in its most important functions, operated upon the States, and, under the latter, that it acts directly upon the individuals who compose those States, he deduced, as a general principle, that the Government of the Union, as now organized, is wholly independent of the States for the execution of any of its powers. So far is this from being correct, in the broad extent assumed by the honorable Speaker, that I have always supposed directly the contrary: that the General Government is dependent upon the States for the execution of all its powers, for it cannot exist, without the concurrence of the States. Are not your Senators, who compose the other branch of the Legislative Department of this Government, elected by the Legislatures of the States? Is not your Executive Magistrate chosen, also, by the agency, and under the direction, of the State Legislatures?

[Here Mr. CLAY explained. He said he never contended that, if a majority of the States withheld their co-operation, the General Government might not be dissolved; but, his principle was, when the General Government is once organized, and moves by its own inherent energy, and acts independently of State power.]

Mr. RIVES said, he had not the pleasure of hearing the speech of the honorable gentleman. He had only read the report of it given in the newspapers, and he thought that the principle to which he had referred, as stated in that report, required some qualification. But, even as now qualified, by the explanations of the Speaker, he was not prepared to give his assent to it. I understand the honorable Speaker, said Mr. R., now to say, that, although the General Government does depend upon the States for its existence, yet, in the ordinary and regular exercise of its vested powers, it is wholly independent of the aid and co-operation of the State governments. I have always entertained, said Mr. R., a different opinion of our political system, and for that opinion I supposed I had the sanction of high authority. The authors of "The Federalist," in various passages of their celebrated work, speak of the State governments as incorporated into the system of the General Government, as auxiliary to its operations, and indeed as indispensable to its maintenance. In one passage, they say emphatically, if the General Government should ever arbitrarily abolish the

H. OF R.

State governments, it would be compelled, by the principle of self-preservation, to reinstate them—implying, as it seems to me, in the strongest manner, the dependence of the General Government upon the aid and co-operation of the State governments. But let us examine this subject more minutely, in reference to some of the powers of the General Government. In the exercise of its military power, which has been so much talked of in the course of this discussion, is there not a partial dependence, at least, of the General Government upon the State governments? The Constitution gives to Congress the power to “provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia;” and “for calling them forth to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, and to repel invasions;” but expressly reserves to the States “the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.” Here, then, we find the General Government made dependent upon the States for the efficient exercise of a vital power, connected with the peace and safety of the nation; for, what is your militia without officers and without training? So, likewise, in relation to another power of Congress, which has been the subject of much commentary, in the course of this debate—I allude to the subject of fortifications, arsenals, &c. Amid the various constructions which have been put upon the clause of the Constitution relating to this subject, all have agreed that the exclusive jurisdiction it gives over the sites of these works, cannot be exercised without the consent of the Legislatures of the States in which they are located. Here, then, we have another example of the dependence of the General Government upon the State governments, in a point belonging to one of its highest trusts, the care of the “common defence.” Whether, therefore, I look to the general aim and scope of the Constitution, or to its particular provisions, I cannot acquiesce in the principle assumed by the honorable Speaker. The application of this principle to the subject of the present discussion, has not been clearly developed, but I presume it is this: If roads and canals are necessary to the legitimate operations of the General Government, that Government, being wholly independent of any extrinsic aid in the prosecution of its lawful objects, may make roads and canals for itself, whenever, and wherever it chooses. I shall hereafter endeavor to show, that, although roads and canals may be essential to some of the purposes of the General Government, yet, they are such facilities as would naturally arise in the progress of society, under the care of the State governments, and that there was, therefore, no necessity to invest the General Government with authority to create them. Any construction which loses sight of the existence of the State governments, and of the important purposes they were intended to fulfil, in reference to the affairs of the Union, as well as the interests of the respective States, is incompatible with the nature of our political system, and necessarily leads us into error.

There were some other general principles laid down in the course of this discussion, the bearing and application of which, to the question under consideration, I could not very distinctly discern. I notice them, therefore, only for the purpose of entering my protest against them. An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) asserted that the General Government was a municipal, or in other words a National Government, as contradistinguished from a Federal Government. I would ask that gentleman who were the parties to the formation of this Government? Were they the people of the United States, as composing one entire nation, or as divided into distinct political communities? Unquestionably the latter. It required, too, for its establishment, not the consent of a majority of the people, merely, but the unanimous ratification of all the States who became parties to it. In the mode provided for its amendment, also, the concurrence of three-fourths of the States is necessary to any alteration of its principles, without regard to individual members. These circumstances unequivocally characterize it as a Federal Government.

In another important relation, the only one involved in the discussion—the extent of its powers—it is decidedly federal and not national. The authority to which the honorable gentleman has appealed, on another branch of the subject, (the Federalist) says, it is of the essence of a national Government to possess a supreme indefinite power over all persons and things, so far as they are the objects of lawful government. But the power of this Government is, by universal acknowledgment, defined, and limited to special objects. By what process, then, has such a Government, distinguished by so many federal features, been converted into a national Government? By a series of refined deductions, which, considering the gentleman's aversion to political metaphysics, does infinite credit to his genius and perspicacity.

Having disposed of these preliminary topics, I come now to consider the particular sources in the Constitution from which the alleged power of Congress to make roads and canals has been deduced. The first of these sources is that clause of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to “establish post offices and post roads,” which, it is contended, is an express grant of the power to make post roads. Whatever contempt, therefore, gentlemen may have for philological disquisitions, or however little they may seem to befit the dignity of legislative discussion, we are necessarily driven to inquire into the true meaning of the word establish. The honorable Speaker has defined it thus, “to make firm, to fix, to build.” I agree with that gentleman in the first part of his definition, but I am unable to follow him in the bound by which he has skipped from “to make firm, to fix,” to the last interpretation, “to build,” which seems to me to depart very widely from the other meanings ascribed to the word. The original and literal import of the word is, unquestionably, to render stable, or “make firm;” and, by an easy transition in its application to new objects, it has come to signify generally to fix, to settle, to ascertain. Let us apply it in this sense, which is sanctioned by the Speaker's definition, to the subject of post roads. There exists in the country a great variety of roads, passing in different directions, and communicating with different points. It is impossible, in the nature of things, that all of them should be used as post roads. The Constitution, therefore, gives to Congress the power to establish, or, according to the terms of the foregoing definition, to fix, to settle, to ascertain, which of them should be used as post roads, and to give them a legal character as such. But the honorable Speaker contends, that the word "establish" implies something more, and is used in a creative sense; for examples of which he refers to the expressions "establish justice," and "ordain and establish this Constitution," used in the preamble of that instrument. These examples do not appear to me to be very apposite to the purpose for which they are cited. It has been very properly said, that the preamble of the Constitution, in stating it to be one of the objects of the new Government "to establish justice," could not have meant that justice was to be created by it. Such an use of the term would be little less than sacrilegious. Justice is an abstract principle, an emanation of the divine mind, always and every where existing. All that the Constitution could accomplish, was to embody it, to organize tribunals and prescribe forms for its administration, and thus establish, or fix it, on sure and permanent foundations.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Surveys for Roads and Canals.

H. OF R.

The honorable Speaker, however, contends, that in one sense, we do create justice—we create, he says, the criminal justice of the country, because we create the crimes, which are prohibited and punished by our laws. But in what sense do we create a crime? We do not create the fact which constitutes the crime, we only create the legal character which is imposed upon that fact.

[Here Mr. CLAY explained. He said there was a distinction between acts which are mala in se, and those which are mala prohibita. As to the latter, they are wrong, only because the Legislature has made them so, and in relation to them, therefore, the law creates the crime.]

Mr. RIVES said, this view of the subject was not affected by the explanation of the honorable gentleman. As to that class of public wrongs which are called mala prohibita, it is true they are in themselves indifferent, and become crimes only because the Legislature makes them so. But what does this prove? It proves only that the Legislature creates the legal character or denomination of the fact prohibited, by making that unlawful which was before lawful; but the Legislature does not create the fact itself, to which this new character or denomination is given. That exists independently, and in spite of the law. This is not only consistent with, but corroborates one explanation of the word "establish," as applied to post roads. Congress, by establishing a post road, gives a new character, a legal attribute to the subject, making that a post road which was before not a post road; but, in the legitimate exercise of this authority, it can no more create the physical, material road, to which the new character is given, than in the case of a crime it creates the external fact to which a penalty is annexed. The same explanation is equally applicable to the expression, "We the people, in order, &c., do ordain and establish this Constitution." The people certainly did not create the Constitution, in the sense in which it is contended that the word "establish" gives to Congress authority to create post roads. The instrument already existed. It had come from the hands of the Convention perfect in all its dimensions, and was submitted to the people for ratification. All that the people did was to establish it, by giving it the sanction of their approbation, and investing it with a legal and binding character. The same kind of authority is conceded to Congress without hesitation in regard to the establishment of post roads.

But we are told, triumphantly, that the word establish must mean the same thing, in relation to post roads, that it does in relation to post offices, and that, as to post offices, it certainly means to create, because Congress, in establishing a post office at a particular place, makes a post office which did not exist before. But what is the nature of this creation? Congress declare that a post office shall be kept at a place where there was no post office before. In doing so, it certainly does not create the place at which the post office is established, but gives to that place a privilege and accommodation which it did not possess before. So, Congress, in establishing a post road, according to what we deem the true interpretation of this power, makes that a post road which was not a post road before, or, in other words, gives to a pre-existing road a character and attribute which did not previously belong to it. The post road is as much created, if gentlemen will insist upon this divine prerogative in the one case, as the post office in the other, and the creation, I will add, no more extends to the road itself, which is the channel of the post route, in the one case, than it does to the place which is the scene of the post office, in the other.

The examples relied upon to support the interpretation which gentlemen have given of the word "establish," seem to me, therefore, to fall very far short of their object. On the contrary, they are not only consistent with, but furnish apt illustrations of, the sense in which we contend it is properly to be understood. The word, in its primitive and most simple sense, means to render stable or make firm, and is strictly applicable to natural objects. But it is now more generally applied to intellectual objects, and when so applied, is of course, used in a figurative sense. Natural objects are established or made firm by means of external support; and, by an obvious analogy, matters of civil and political regulation are said to be established or made firm when we give to them the support and sanction of law. In this sense, the word is uniformly used in the Constitution, and all similar instruments, with such modifications only as necessarily arise from the nature of the subject to which it was applied. It was intended, as gentlemen allege, to give to Congress the power to make post roads, why was not that power granted in terms which every person would have understood, and about which there could be no controversy? Was the poverty of the language so great, or were the framers of the Constitution so deficient in their knowledge of it, as to have supplied no word fitted to convey the idea? When we speak of the erection of a house, we do not say that such a one has established a house, but that he has built it. If it had been intended to give to Congress the power now claimed for it, why did not the framers of the Constitution say, in so many words, that Congress shall have power to make and construct post roads? These words were at hand, and were well adapted to the purpose of conveying such a power. That they, or other words of plainly equivalent meaning, were not used, is evidence that the power they import was not intended to be given.

It was not necessary to the nature and object of this grant that Congress should possess the power to make post roads. The object of the grant was the conveyance of the mail, and the transmission of intelligence through the country. It never could have been contemplated that intelligence should be transmitted to an unsettled country, where there were no persons to receive it. But, as soon as a country becomes settled, roads necessarily exist. The great interests of society, the operations of commerce, and the convenience of private intercourse, necessarily give rise to them; and as the population and demands for intelligence increase, the facilities of communication increase also. The same roads which answer the ordinary purposes of society, would certainly suffice for the simple object of transporting the mail. It never could have been intended, in reference to such an object, to confer upon Congress the disproportionate power of opening and constructing roads through the territories of the States. Whether, therefore, I look to the language of the Constitution, or to the policy of its provisions, in relation to this subject, I am alike constrained to discard the construction which claims for Congress the power in question, under the clause we have been considering.

The next source which the advocates of the bill have appealed to for the authority to execute a system of internal improvements, is, the military power of the Government. The authority claimed under this part of the Constitution extends to canals as well as roads. It is not, however, like the authority asserted in relation to post roads, claimed as an express power, but only as an incidental power, or means of carrying another power into effect. The first inquiry which presents itself, therefore, is, as to the true nature and extent of incidental powers. It must never be forgotten that this Government is one of limited and defined powers. However ready gentlemen are to admit this proposition, when their assent is distinctly challenged to it, they seem habitually to lose sight of it in their reasonings upon Constitutional questions. All the powers granted to the Government are enumerated in the Constitution; but, as it was impossible to foresee every individual act of legislation which might become necessary to carry these powers into effect, Congress is in general authorized to do any act which shall be "necessary and proper" for carrying the granted powers into execution, but none other. If we depart from this limit, we at once change the character of the Government, as possessing special and defined powers only, and convert it into one of general discretionary authority. Whenever any measure is proposed, therefore, the first question to be asked is, Is the authority to adopt it expressly granted in the Constitution? If it be not, the next question is, Is it a necessary and proper means of carrying into execution any power which is expressly granted? If it is not pretended that the authority to make roads and canals for military purposes is expressly granted to Congress, is it, then, a necessary and proper means for carrying into execution the military powers which are granted? I will not deny that roads and canals are useful, or, if you please, necessary, to the military operations of the Government. But this is not the question. The real point of inquiry is, Is it necessary to the military operations of the Government that Congress should possess the power to make them? Roads and canals would exist from the influence of other causes, without invoking the agency of Congress. They are, as already suggested, the natural and invariable accompaniments of population, in every country. The wants and enterprise of individuals, the common interests of society, and the paternal care of the State governments, which are more particularly charged with the domestic police of the country, would bring them into existence. The same causes would insure their multiplication and improvement. As the country improved in wealth and population, the means of communication would improve with it. The members of the Convention, as men ordinarily conversant, at least, with human affairs, must have foreseen this natural course of things, and could not have deemed it necessary to give to Congress the power of creating channels of communication, which would certainly grow out of the wants of society and the beneficent superintendence of the State governments. All that was necessary, was to give to the General Government the right of using these highways, in prosecuting its military and other lawful operations, and this right is conceded to it in the fullest extent. Will any gentleman deny that food and clothing are as necessary for the subsistence of the soldier as roads for him to march upon? And yet, it will not be contended that Congress has authority to condemn and occupy large portions of the territory of the States for farms to produce the one, or factories to supply the other. Why? Because the natural wants of society furnish the best security that these articles will be produced, and render it unnecessary to invest the Government with any authority for the purpose. But it is said that, in the defence of the country, and the military operations connected with it, other and better channels of communication would be required than those already existing under the authority of the States. Let us pause, and see to what extent this idea would carry us. We have an extensive frontier, and are exposed to attack on every side of it. On the Atlantic coast we are exposed to the hostilities of any European Power, and, through the whole extent of our inland frontier, we are liable to the incursions of our British, Spanish, and Indian neighbors. If we undertake a system of roads and canals with a view to facilitate the operations of war, as it is uncertain in what quarter we shall be assailed, we must extend them to every point of our frontier. The whole face of our territory would thus be covered with military roads and canals. Is not this a solecism in legislation? Military roads and canals, which would be used for civil and commercial purposes more than a thousand times for once that they would be applied to military purposes! Whether they would ever be used, indeed, for military purposes, would depend upon remote and dubious contingencies, the occurrence of which no man could foresee.

But, leaving this view of the subject, and returning to the principles first laid down, as to the just extent of the incidental powers of the Government, I ask if it be possible to justify the measure proposed by the application of those principles? A national system of roads and canals, under the exclusive patronage of Congress, cannot, in any sense of the term, be said to be necessary to the making and prosecuting of war. Wars have been made and prosecuted, and successfully prosecuted, without any such system. All that can be said of it is, that it might have a tendency to give greater effect and increased energy to the exertion of the national force in time of war. But, if the power to declare war authorizes Congress to do every thing which may have a tendency to add to the strength and resources of the nation, in a military point of view, then there is nothing connected with the "general welfare" which Congress may not do; for, whatever advances the interests of learning, of manufactures, of agriculture, of commerce, or in any manner promotes the internal prosperity of the country, certainly has a tendency to increase its strength, in a conflict with a foreign enemy. A principle of construction, leading to such consequences, cannot be maintained. The honorable Speaker expressed his acquiescence in the principles asserted by Virginia in 1798. Those principles were embalmed and immortalized in the celebrated report of Mr. Madison, which has been mentioned in the course of this debate. The principles contained in that report do not derive their sanction from the great name alone with which they are associated. They received a still higher sanction—that of the American people. For, it was the potent influence of these very principles which wrought, by the voice of the people, that change of men and measures, in the administration of the Government, which has been emphatically styled the civil revolution of 1801. If any writings, therefore, can be fairly appealed to as authority in Constitutional discussions, it is this report. [Here Mr. R. read extracts from "Madison's report."] The simple criterion, then, is this: the measure sought to be adopted, as incidental to an express power, must have an "immediate and appropriate relation to that power, as a means necessary and proper for carrying it into execution. "A tendency, merely, in the measure to promote an object for which Congress is authorized to provide," does not justify its adoption. Now, does not all that has been said, and can be said, in favor of a national system of roads and canals, amount to this—that they would have a tendency to promote or facilitate the operations of war—not that they have an immediate and appropriate relation to the power of making war—as means necessary and proper for carrying that power into execution. One of my colleagues (Mr. J. S. BARBOUR) adverted to this rule for the deduction of incidental powers, and seemed to think it too rigid, because, he said, it excludes a choice of means. Sir, it does not exclude a choice of means; it only limits that choice. And permit me to say that, in order to preserve the true character of this Government, it is as necessary to limit the means of executing its powers as to limit the powers themselves; for, in the language of the distinguished authority which I have just quoted, "it is wholly immaterial whether unlimited powers be exercised in the name of unlimited powers, or in the name of unlimited means of carrying limited powers into execution."

But, we have been gravely told that roads and canals are fortifications. Why, sir, a lively imagination and an ardent zeal may convert any thing into fortifications. It may be said, with as much justice, and as little violence of metaphor, that the hearts of our people are fortifications; for, after all, the moral energies of a nation are as important to its defence as physical works of any sort. As a part, then, of this system of military defence, we must establish schools and colleges, to imbue the minds of our youth with the love of liberty, a knowledge of the principles of our free institutions, and a loyal and patriotic devotion to their country! In like manner, the granaries of the farmer are fortifications—the workshops of the mechanic are fortifications—for they furnish the indispensable means of subsistence to the troops who are to defend you. Thus, by the magic influence of language, Congress, in the exercise of its military functions, may invest itself with a general and unlimited patronage of all the great interests of society—its education, its agriculture, its industry.

It has been triumphantly asked if Congress can erect forts and dock yards, may they not make roads to go into them? Unquestionably, the right to erect these works, necessarily implies the right of way, by which a communication is to be had with them. If there be no road leading to them, the Government may render its right of way effectual, by opening a road for the purpose of communication. But what is the road in this case? It is strictly an appurtenance to the fort or dock yard, and is confined to the purpose of communication with it. It is a thing wholly distinct from a system of internal improvements, having no actual connexion with any military work, nor bearing any peculiar and appropriate relation to military operations. There can be no doubt that the General Government has a right of passage through the territory of the States for any of its lawful purposes, and it may, therefore, in time of war, open a military road, when it is necessary to the accomplishment of any particular military movement. In such a case, it has a right to a passage; and there can be no passage without a road. But the road is then made and used, pro hac vice only, and as soon as the passage is effected, all property in, or jurisdiction over it, ceases and dies. The right strictly commences and terminates with the occasion of its increase. This case, therefore, affords no countenance to the claim of a general power to execute and maintain a permanent system of internal improvements, in reference to future and remote contingencies, which may never occur. In the view which I have taken of this subject, I have not found it material to inquire into the right which has been claimed for the General Government of possessing itself of the soil of the States, when it is necessary to the execution of any of its powers. It is admitted by all that it cannot do so, except in cases where it is necessary to the execution of some of its powers. In each particular case, therefore, the question recurs, is the proposed occupation of the soil of the States necessary to the execution of any of the powers of the Government. My object has been to show that the occupation of it, for the purpose of making roads and canals, is not necessary to the execution of the military power of the Government, and cannot be justified by any sound doctrines of Constitutional law.

The only remaining ground worthy of particular consideration, upon which the authority of this Government to make roads and canals has been asserted, is that portion of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power "to regulate commerce among the several States." The honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) seemed to treat this as a question of incidental power; but it is strictly and exclusively a question of express power. The whole controversy depends upon the true import of the word regulate. If to regulate means to promote or to facilitate, then the power to make roads and canals, as an ordinary and natural mode of facilitating or promoting commerce, seems to be clearly comprehended in the terms of the grant. If, however, to regulate means to make rules, (as it certainly does, in the plain and common use of the word,) then it gives to Congress no other power than that of making the rules or prescribing the terms upon which commerce among the States shall be conducted—that is, the power of making commercial regulations, as applicable to the reciprocal trade of the States. But, would any person call roads and canals commercial regulations? The whole question, then, might be safely left to an unsophisticated common-sense interpretation of the language of the Constitution. But, as the argument of the gentleman from Delaware was certainly an original and ingenious one, I beg leave to analyze and examine it more particularly. The outline of the argument was this—that the object of granting to Congress the power of regulating commerce among the States was not, as had been supposed, to prevent one State from laying burdens on the productions of another State passing through its jurisdiction, (that object being adequately provided for by another clause of the Constitution,) but to prevent a greater mischief—absolute prohibitions of the passage—which, if they should occur, it would be competent for Congress under this power to remove. That, if Congress can remove legal restraints upon the trade of the States, it can remove physical obstructions; and if it can remove physical obstructions to the trade of the States, it can create new channels for it. However nicely concatenated this chain of deductions seems to be, I shall endeavor to show that some of its links are too feebly connected to sustain the conclusion which depends upon it. The gentleman's first position is, that the power to regulate commerce among the States was not given to Congress to prevent one State from imposing duties on the productions of another passing through its jurisdiction; because, if this were the only object, the power would be nugatory—another clause of the Constitution having expressly restrained the States from laying duties on imports or exports. In relation to this position, I will only remark that the honorable gentleman seems to have mistaken the purpose for which the passage in the Federalist upon this subject was read by my able colleague (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) who opened this discussion. That purpose was not to show, nor does the authority cited import, that the only object of the power in question was to prevent the States from imposing duties on the productions of each other passing through their respective jurisdictions. It was mentioned merely as one of the objects of the power. A further object undoubtedly was (as the gentleman himself has satisfactorily shown) to prevent arbitrary interruptions of the trade of the States, arising from acts of positive prohibition and other similar impediments. But the gentleman is not satisfied even with this extension of the power. He says that a power of such apparent magnitude could not have been intended to be passive—a monument of its own insignificance—and that, if it extends to removing no other obstacles than such as may be interposed by adverse and unfriendly legislation of the States, it becomes utterly passive. Why, sir, it is in this respect like many other powers granted by the Constitution. The powers to "repel invasions and to suppress insurrections" are passive, until the other proper occasions occur to bring them into action. And the honorable gentleman will permit me to remind him that this very horror of passive authority acting upon one of the powers just mentioned, was the parent of the Sedition law. The reasoning was this—the power to "suppress insurrections" implies the power to prevent them; and the power to prevent them implies the power to punish whatever may tend or lead to them. Libels upon the Government tend or lead to insurrections; therefore Congress may pass a sedition law for the punishment of libels.

The system of reasoning now employed to justify the exercise of power contemplated by this bill, is equally, and indeed, to my mind, much more forced and arbitrary, in its chain of inferences. What is it? The power to regulate commerce among the States authorizes Congress to remove legislative restraints, imposed by one State upon the trade of another, passing through its jurisdiction. The power to remove legislative restraints, implies the power to remove natural obstructions; and a power to remove natural obstructions, implies a power to give artificial facilities; or, in other words, to make roads and canals. But, is it true, that the power to remove legislative restraints implies the power to remove natural obstructions, and to give artificial facilities? The one aims only to protect commerce in its actual channels: the other seeks to open additional channels for commerce. The object of the former is merely to secure the free use of existing highways; the effort of the latter, is to create and construct new highways. These things are, in their natures, so essentially distinct, that an inference from one to the other, is wholly arbitrary and inadmissible. But the honorable gentleman from Delaware need not be afraid that this power will remain passive, unless it is exerted in giving artificial facilities to trade. It has already been exerted, and copiously exerted, in the various and minute regulations connected with the coasting trade, and this was probably the chief, if not the only, employment of it, contemplated by the framers of the Constitution.

The gentleman read a passage from Vattel, for the purpose of proving the connexion between good roads and canals, and the welfare of trade. But nothing is gained by this position, which is very readily admitted, until it is also proved that Congress has a general power to promote the welfare of trade. The application of this authority, therefore, proceeds upon an assumption of the very point in dispute. A similar defect exists in the argument which claims for the General Government the same authority to make roads and canals between these States, that the government of each State has to make roads and canals within its own limits. The State governments have, undoubtedly, the right to make roads and canals within their respective limits; but from what does this right result? From the general discretionary power which the State governments possess, to provide for the public welfare. Before the argument can be sustained, then, it must be shown that the General Government possesses a like discretionary power, to provide for the public welfare. The State governments do not make roads and canals by virtue of a specific power to regulate commerce among the several portions of the same State. If they possessed no other power than this, it would not be competent for them to make roads and canals.

Much reliance has been placed, by the gentleman from Delaware, as well as other gentlemen who have participated in this discussion, upon what is said to have been the practical construction of the power to "regulate foreign commerce." It is contended that Congress possesses the same power in relation to "commerce among the several States," that it does in relation to "foreign commerce;" and that, as, under the power of regulating foreign commerce, it has erected lighthouses, beacons, buoys, &c., with a view to give safety and facility to that commerce, it may, under the power of "regulating commerce among the States," construct roads and canals, to give safety and facility to the internal trade of the country. I beg leave to ask those gentlemen, by what authority they refer the erection of the lighthouses, beacons, &c., to the power to regulate foreign commerce? There is no evidence upon the face of the laws themselves, which were passed for their erection, that Congress legislated under the idea that they derived the right to erect them from the power to regulate foreign commerce. There is collateral evidence, however, that they legislated with reference to another clause of the Constitution. It was mentioned by my colleague, who opened this discussion, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) that the statute book contained a list of cessions made by the several States, of the sites for these buildings. The only cases in which the Constitution requires the previous consent of the States to the alienation of territory, are those relating to the Seat of Government, and all such places as may be acquired for the "erection of forts, dock yards, &c., and other needful buildings." It would seem, therefore, from the formal cessions made by the States, of sites for lighthouses, &c., that Congress legislated with reference to this part of the Constitution. Another explanation has been suggested, by an honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. WOOD,) who refers the erection of these buildings to the power to lay and collect duties. The duties laid, accrue only upon the arrival in our ports of the goods and vessels charged with them. Whatever, therefore, gives security and facility to an entrance into our ports, has an immediate relation to this branch of the public revenue. I have mentioned these explanations only for the purpose of showing that the erection of lighthouses, beacons, &c., can be accounted for, and have been accounted for, plausibly at least, without referring them to the power of regulating foreign commerce. It is not necessary for me to decide under what clause of the Constitution these buildings were erected. I will only say, that both of the explanations just mentioned are as satisfactory to my mind, as the one which refers them to the power of regulating foreign commerce. Gentlemen have taken it for granted, without offering to prove, that they were erected under this clause of the Constitution, for the sake, I presume, of the precedent it would afford them, in the interpretation of the power to regulate commerce among the States. I beg leave, however, to say, that, whatever may have been the construction of the Constitution under which these lighthouses were built, or any other act that has been done by preceding Congresses, I cannot regard such construction as legitimate and conclusive evidence of the true meaning of the Constitution, and binding upon ourselves and our successors. The gentleman from Delaware said it was a great error to consider the authority to make roads and canals as a distinct, instead of a subsidiary power. If any power, from its magnitude and extent, ought to be regarded as a distinct and independent power, it is this. The Congress has granted, by distinct clauses, several other powers which might, with much more propriety, have been regarded as subsidiary powers, and left to implication. What would seem more naturally to appertain to the regulation of commerce among the States than the power of coining money, the very instrument of commerce, of fixing its value, of establishing a common standard of weights and measures, uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy, and post offices and post roads? Yet, all these powers are the subjects of express and distinct grants! What could more properly be considered as incidental to the power of declaring war than to raise and support armies, provide and maintain a navy, make rules for the government of the land and naval forces? And yet it was thought necessary to give these and other similar powers by direct and explicit declarations in the Constitution! It will not be said that roads and canals bear a more direct and immediate relation to the military and commercial powers of the Government, or are of less dignity and importance in their character, than many of the powers just enumerated. Why, then, I will ask the gentleman from Delaware, if the power to make them was intended to be given, was it not, in like manner, distinctly granted?

In inquiries of this sort, Mr. Chairman, the opinions of no man, however illustrious by his virtue or his wisdom, ought to preclude the exercise of our own deliberate judgments. There is, however, a degree of respect which all acknowledge to be due to the opinions of the distinguished men who either participated in the formation of our Government, or have since borne a conspicuous part in its administration. It is known to the Committee that three successive Presidents of the United States have felt it their duty to announce to Congress, in the most solemn form, their settled conviction that this Government does not possess the power now in question. I will not, however, insist upon their testimony, because they are Virginians, and we have abundant evidence that Virginia politics have gone out of favor. There is an authority, however, which I will quote, and the weight of which I feel myself entitled to press upon this Committee. It is that of Alexander Hamilton. His opinions upon this subject are of peculiar value, not only because he was a member of the Convention which framed the Constitution, and one of the authors of the celebrated commentary upon its principles, but because he is known to have indulged a strong bias in favor of the powers of the General Government, and to have adopted the most liberal doctrines in their interpretation. Yet, even Mr. Hamilton, with all his leaning towards Federal authority, could find no warrant in the Constitution for the power to make roads and canals. In his report on manufactures, after speaking of the importance of roads and canals to the prosperity of manufactures, and mentioning several reasons why it is desirable that the General Government should possess the authority to make them, he concludes by saying, these circumstances "render it a wish of patriotism" that the General Government "were at liberty to pursue and promote the general interest" by adopting a national system of internal improvements. Here, then, we have an unequivocal admission that the General Government is not now "at liberty" to adopt this system—an admission the more precious, because it is evidently made with great reluctance.

In answer to a remark made by one of my colleagues, (Mr. ARCHER,) that, at the adoption of the Constitution, no allusion was made to the existence of such a power as is now claimed, a gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) mentioned an amendment to the Constitution which was proposed by a Mr. Jones in the convention of that State, the substance of which was, that the power to establish post roads should not be construed to extend to the making, laying out, and repairing of roads, in the several States, without their consent. This amendment cannot be fairly considered even as evidence of Mr. Jones's opinion, that Congress possessed the power to make roads under the clause of the Constitution referred to. All that it proves is, that Mr. Jones apprehended that this clause might hereafter be construed to give to Congress the power to make roads, and that he wished, in such an event, to render its exercise as innocent as possible, by requiring the previous consent of the States in which the roads should be laid out. The very first of the actual amendments to the Constitution declares that "Congress shall make no law restraining the free exercise of religion, abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of petitioning." Is it to be inferred from this amendment that, without it, Congress could lawfully have done the things inhibited by it? I presume not. The truth is, that this and several other amendments arose from a spirit of jealous caution, and an apprehension of future encroachment from the General Government, and furnish no evidence of the opinions entertained of the real extent of the powers granted.

But, whatever may have been the opinion of Mr. Jones, I may be permitted to oppose to it the authority of Patrick Henry, who, in the debates of the Virginia convention, after depicting in the most glowing colors what he deemed the vast powers of the General Government, and the dangers of consolidation, concluded by saying, "all that is left to the States is, to take care of the poor, make and repair highways, erect bridges," &c. Even this jealous guardian of State rights, who descried the remotest dangers which threatened the safety of our republican institutions, and "snuffed the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze," even he, while he believed that every other power was swallowed up by the General Government, was satisfied that this portion of sovereignty, at least, was left entire to the States. And, if he could have foreseen the attempt which is now made to appropriate to the General Government this portion of State sovereignty, none would have alarmed him more, for none is more directly calculated to lead to consolidation. It is a power which comes home to the business and bosoms of the people; it approaches their firesides, and touches their most intimate domestic interests. If the inhabitants of the States, instead of looking to their governments at home, are to look to the General Government, (as they certainly will, if this system should be adopted,) for the ordinary facilities of travelling and transportation; then the State governments become useless machines, and are not worth the expense of maintaining. You supersede them in the exercise of their most appropriate functions, and dissolve the strongest tie which connects them with the people of the States. What, then, becomes of the boasted equilibrium of our system, which has always been regarded as the best preservative of our liberties? It is gone; it is doubly gone. You destroy it, not only by taking away, in effect, an important power from the State governments, but by delivering the same power, with an increased mass of patronage and of influence, into the hands of the General Government.

When Mr. RIVES had concluded—

Mr. BUCKNER, of Kentucky, said, that, in requesting the indulgence of the Committee, he very much feared that he should be considered as guilty of a most unseasonable and improper intrusion. He knew that the subject had excited great interest throughout every part of the Union, and had been investigated long since, by some of the most able and enlightened statesmen of the country; and, among others, by our present venerable Chief Magistrate, whose opinions must at all times be considered as entitled to the very highest respect, whether we regard that sincerity of heart, and devotion to the interests of his country, which have so uniformly marked his course, or that fund of useful practical information and powers of strong logical argument which have gained for him the eminent and dignified stand which he now occupies. Nor, sir, continued he, shall I forget, that, within a few days past, this subject has been most ably and elaborately discussed. It would, therefore, be vanity in him to suppose that he could cast upon it any great additional light. The disposition, however, so evidently displayed by the Committee, to listen to all that could be urged, for or against a system of internal improvement by this Government, (to which the present bill was to be considered but as a preparatory step,) had encouraged him to offer the few remarks he was about to submit. In doing it, he was satisfied that he had nothing to depend upon to insure attention, but their kindness and complaisance. Mr. B. said he should vote for the passage of the bill, because he did not feel any doubts as to the constitutionality of the measure, and, from a conviction that the most salutary consequences would result from it, to the Union. A most gloomy and terrific picture of its effects had been drawn by several gentlemen opposed to the bill. They would induce us to believe that it will be an usurpation of power, on the part of the General Government, by which State sovereignty is to be destroyed, and the fabric of liberty made to totter to its very centre. An honorable gentleman from Vermont (Mr. MALLARY) has represented this Government as commencing the attack upon the State which he has the honor in part to represent; and under the fair pretence of regulating and facilitating commerce between the States, and providing the means of diffusing political information, a road or a canal is made. No other State would feel sufficient interest to interfere in the matter, and poor Vermont, unaided and alone, falls an easy victim in this most unequal contest. Some adjoining State next feels the grasp of tyranny and usurpation; and thus the States, one by one, share the same fate. But is not all this mere fancy? How, in the name of common sense, said Mr. B., can the making of a fine road or canal in a State, over which, when made, the General Government will not attempt the exercise of an exclusive legislation, operate to the injury of such State, or in the least impair its sovereignty? If, sir, this Government shall ever so far lose sight of its true principles, as to aim at the downfall of State rights, it will not commence the perpetration of so wicked and nefarious a design, by exhausting its funds in improving, beautifying, and strengthening the States. The powers, which are indisputably conferred on it, to lay and collect taxes, without limitation, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, &c., are the means which would be resorted to; and against the abuse of which powers, the intelligence and patriotism of our citizens, and the responsibility of every officer of the Government, either mediately or immediately, to the people, form the only sure and effectual protection.

Such, sir, continued Mr. B., are the advantages which would, in my estimation, result to the United States, by the adoption and judicious execution of a system of internal improvement, by this Government, that, before its expediency was questioned by those who stand opposed to the passage of this bill, I had supposed the argument would have turned exclusively on the Constitutional question involved in it. The President, in the objections which he made to the passage of a bill on a former occasion, embracing the same point, not only acknowledges the propriety of such a measure, (if, constitutionally, it could be executed,) but warmly recommends such an amendment of the Constitution, as would clearly confer the necessary power. But it has been insisted that each State could attend, with more convenience, to the construction of such improvements as might be necessary, than the General Government; because they would be more immediately under the inspection of such State. Whether, however, they be made by a State or by this Government, it is evident that the construction of them would be superintended by agents employed for that purpose; or that they would be made by individuals, under contract, with the Government. It would, therefore, be as convenient to the one as to the other. But if ever this Government shall attempt such a course, it was said that partiality was to be displayed. Such a conclusion, however, is deducible only from that want of integrity and vigilance in those to whom the management of the public concerns may be confided, which cannot reasonably be presumed; and ought not, therefore, to be indulged in. The argument relied upon to prove the inexpediency of the measure, in which it was insisted that an interference by this Government would very much diminish, if not entirely take away, all inducements on the part of each State to incur much trouble or expense in making roads and canals, appears to be entitled to rather more consideration. But it is evident that no projects of the kind, except those of great national importance, ought or would be undertaken by it; and as to them, from the want of concert and unanimity of purpose between the States through whose territory the road or canal might be conducted, as well as from the further consideration that it might not be the interest of any one State to undertake them, we cannot hope to see much effected through the public spirit of any one or more States. Take, for example, the great Cumberland road—would it ever have been undertaken or completed by the States through which it passes? And yet who would deny its great and almost unlimited importance to the Union? It stands a proud monument of national industry and the patriotic enterprise of its projectors. He needed not, however, consume time by considering separately all the objections which had been urged against a system of internal improvement. Its advantages were too obvious to require such a course. It would give an additional impulse to, and open new sources of, commerce between the States, (a consideration, in his opinion, far more important than our foreign commerce;) it would furnish strong incentives to industry, and would save great labor and expense to our citizens in carrying their produce from one part of the country to another. The facilities, also, which it would afford to the United States, in marching our armies, in transporting to points where they may be wanted, provisions, arms, and all the munitions of war, could not be too highly appreciated. But in no point of view, said he, would it be more important, than in the happy effect it would produce in extending and encouraging a familiar intercourse between our citizens. An honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. S.) has told us, that “he entertains no fears upon the subject; that no man could make him believe that the rejection of this bill, or the refusal to exercise the power now claimed, is to separate these States, or alienate the affections of the West from the Union.”

No, sir, said Mr. B., as a representative of a certain portion of that brave and patriotic people, I should be sorely mortified, could it with propriety be insinuated, that such a measure was particularly necessary for the West; or that they felt less devotion to the interests and prosperity of their Government, than the people of any other section of the United States. He meant not vainly to boast of either their valor or their patriotism. Let their conduct during the last war, and on all occasions when an opportunity has offered for a display of those noble virtues, bear testimony in their favor. It affords a more unerring test of their worth than idle eulogiums, which are often pronounced when least deserved. But, sir, continued he, since the observations of that gentleman have authorized a reply, he would assure him that the Western people shrink not from a comparison with any, however ardent their zeal for the public cause may be, or however meritorious were their public services. They are devoted to their Government, as securing to them all the blessings of freemen, and are willing and ready, at all times when necessary, to risk their property and their lives in support of that liberty which they regard as the richest legacy bequeathed to them by their ancestors—that liberty before whose altar they had been taught from their very infancy, to bow as with an idolatrous reverence. But the measure proposed, it is believed, cannot fail to have a salutary effect on all. We have an extensive territory, which, from time to time, is getting to be still more extensive, and with it our population is spreading. Our Government, although the best, no doubt, that any people on earth were ever blessed with, is still the result of human wisdom, and, therefore, not perfect. With all its excellencies, its warmest and most enthusiastic admirers would not insist that energy and promptness of action are its distinguishing characteristics. There appeared, to be sure, at this particular time, to be but little necessity of forming additional ligaments by which to unite us; all appear to be actuated by one common purpose. He would not even say that there had been a period since the establishment of this Government when strong symptoms of an approaching storm had appeared. It would not, perhaps, be proper to recur to any particular occasion of the kind as a topic of public discussion. If at any time our political horizon had been darkened by such a cloud, happily it had been long since dissipated, and the sunshine of harmony and good feeling again warmed and illumined every part of this great and flourishing Republic.

But, let it be recollected, said Mr. B., that we are as yet in the youthful vigor of our republican principles. Our domestic situation may not always present a prospect so pleasing. We cannot claim an entire exemption from some portion of that combustible matter which was to be found, to a greater or less extent, in the bosom of every Government that ever existed, or ever will exist, until human nature shall be changed—until angry passions shall no longer swell the human breast—nor a sleepless ambition disturb its repose. As wise legislators, then, let us take every step in our power to perpetuate the Union, which had produced a rapidity of growth in national prosperity and importance of which the history of mankind furnishes no parallel; which, with the representative principle, has made our Government the admiration of the wise of every country, if not the dread of tyrants throughout the world. A separation of the States is an evil not only more probable, but even more to be deprecated than a consolidation of power; and if ever the predictions of our downfall by the enemies of Republics shall be realized, it is to be the result of a separation produced by sectional feelings and jealousies. But, whatever may be the advantages of the proposed measure, it is insisted that the Constitution confers no power on Congress to interfere in it. If gentlemen be correct in that view of the subject, so let it rest, until, by an amendment, all doubt may be removed; for no blessing should be considered as otherwise than dearly purchased by a wilful violation of that sacred instrument. Believing, however, that the necessary power had been clearly conferred, he would concisely give his views on that subject.

Permit me, however, said Mr. B., before I enter into a particular examination of the clause by which the power is either expressly given, or from which it is clearly deducible, to answer some remarks made as to the nature of our Government, and the powers intended to be conferred on it. It was insisted, that those matters only were intended to be confided to the care of this Government, in which all the States were equally interested; and, assuming that position as correct, it was further urged, that a road or a canal, in a particular State, could not be equally interesting and beneficial to every part of the United States. No view, however, could be more obviously incorrect. The regulation of foreign commerce is expressly delegated to Congress—so is also the power to provide and maintain a navy. In these matters, every part of the Union is interested; but are they all equally interested? Are there not States whose safety is less dependent on the protection afforded by a navy, than others which lie exposed on the seacoast? Are there not States whose situation and internal resources render them less dependent than others, upon the aid of foreign commerce? Other matters, in which all are equally interested, have been left to the direction of the States respectively. In the administration of justice, for instance, all feel an equal interest. It is as important to the people of Kentucky, that their statute of descents should be bottomed upon correct principles, as it is to the people of Virginia; yet each State is left to exercise an uncontrolled discretion over that subject within its own territory. I do not know, said Mr. B., that any certain rule could be laid down by which to judge of the intention of the framers of the Constitution, respecting the power granted. It was necessary to confer so much as would be sufficient to provide for the common defence and general welfare; and they appear to have been, in most cases, cautious not to leave to the control of the States, such matters as would most probably have been managed by each State with an eye to its own aggrandizement, regardless of the interest of others—as, for example, foreign commerce, and commerce among the States. Under the Articles of Confederation, previous to the adoption of our Constitution, various regulations concerning commerce were made by different States, founded upon dissimilar views of the subject, and regardless of the interests of any other State, except that adopting the regulations, which proved injurious to all; and hence the clause in the ninth section of the first article: “No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one State over those of another,” &c. And here, sir, said Mr. B., let me remark, that the observations already made, as to the inequality of interests of different States, in the protection and extension of foreign commerce, and as to a navy, furnish a satisfactory answer to the argument relied on, that, as the Constitution provides that “all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States,” and that no capitation, or other direct tax, shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration directed to be taken, therefore no appropriation of money could be made, to the construction of a road or a canal, in one State, which would not afford equal advantages to all. Indeed, few, if any, appropriations are made, which operate with perfect equality on every section. A certain degree of liberality and magnanimity of temper must be observed, on such occasions, or it is in vain that we have associated for the purposes of common defence and general welfare. It has also been insisted, that all municipal power was intended to be reserved to the States respectively, and that, as the power to make a road or a canal is of that character, therefore it was not intended to be granted. The conclusion is correct, if the premises be so; but here, again, the fallacy of the argument results from the error of the position assumed. But the true question here is, not by what name the power granted should be called, but has the power been granted? It is immaterial whether we call it a national, a federal, or a municipal power; whether it was conferred by the States as such, or by the people of the United States, as a nation. In either case, it was granted by those who had a right to do so. If, however, it were necessary to show that power, strictly municipal, has been conferred on Congress, I would only ask, said Mr. B., what is meant by municipal power; and then turn to the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. The obligation of national law cannot be traced to legislative enactment. It depends upon the principles of natural justice, and has been adopted by the consent of nations. Municipal or civil law is a rule of conduct prescribed by a people for the government of themselves. “Civile jus est quod quisque populus sibi constituit.”

I proceed now, said Mr. B., to the examination of the clause of the Constitution, which gives to Congress the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, &c. What is meant by the regulation of commerce? Does it consist in prescribing rules concerning it, without the power to enforce those rules? Or, was it intended to give to Congress its entire management and direction? It is said that this power was given “to prevent undue advantages being taken of those States which were less favorably situated than others, by the laying of exactions on the passage of their products to a market.” Suppose, then, that a State should lay and attempt to enforce such exactions, could not the General Government interpose its authority and remedy the evil? Its power in such cases could not be denied. If a State should attempt to prevent the citizens of any other State from a free passage with their produce, through the territory of such State, by placing obstacles in the way, as by closing the only direct or convenient road, would any one deny the propriety of the interference of the General Government? If, then, Congress has the power, so far to regulate commerce between the States as to provide for the removal of such obstacles, upon the same reasoning it must be admitted that it has the power to cause natural obstructions to be removed by opening a necessary road and canal. The citizens of some States would be in a most unpleasant predicament, if any other State had the right to refuse to them permission to pass through its territory with their produce. If it cannot prevent them by exactions, so neither can it by clearing a road, or by refusing to open one, or to permit it to be opened.

But this, say gentlemen, is a limited Government, and especially in its powers of appropriation. Be it so. But if we have a right to appropriate money under this clause, for the purpose of protecting and extending foreign commerce, we have the same right to aid, in the same way, commerce among the several States. From the very commencement of this Government to the present period, has Congress claimed and exercised the right to appropriate large sums of money to facilitate and extend foreign commerce, by the erection of not only lighthouses, &c., which are within State limits, but also for other conveniences, such as buoys, marine canals, &c. Now, although the exercise of such a power does not prove that it has been rightfully exercised, yet I must insist, that the construction thus given to the Constitution, which has been persevered in for such a series of years, which has never been complained of by any, and which has proven to be practically beneficial, ought to be considered as conclusive. Indeed, all who oppose this measure, acknowledge the correctness of such appropriations for foreign commerce, when made under the eighth section of the first article, or when made beyond the limits of a State. If, then, this be a limited Government, in its powers of appropriation, and cannot direct one cent to be expended for the effectuation of any object, which the Constitution does not recognise as correct, and money has been rightfully expended to facilitate foreign commerce, it follows, of course, that the Constitution authorizes the appropriation of money for the same purposes, and to the same extent, in relation to the encouragement of commerce among the States, for the power is granted as to each kind of commerce, in the same clause, and by the same words, "to regulate." The rules of construction, as to all grants, are the same. If, by deed, two tracts of land were conveyed to the same individual, in the same clause and words, it would be a strange construction of such deed to say, that as to one tract, an estate in fee simple passed; but, as to the other, an estate for life only, or for years. The gentlemen from Virginia (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR) thinks that the analogy from the general power to the particular act, is not as strong in the one case as the other. He furnished us, however, with no reasons, I believe, for the opinion. The necessity, as well as propriety of extending aid to commerce among the States, is surely as great as it is to foreign commerce. Having then shown that Congress has constitutionally the right to appropriate money for the regulation of domestic commerce, let us consider how far they may do so, for the construction of such improvements as may be necessary for that purpose, within the limits of a State. Who can complain of the General Government for procuring property in the different States, upon which to make those improvements to regulate commerce among them? The States. Who granted the power to appropriate money for that purpose? I answer, the States. Is it, then, consistent with good reasoning, to argue, that they conferred upon Congress a right to lay out the public money to regulate commerce among them; and yet, that they intended to withhold from it the means of pursuing that course, which, of all others, is the best calculated to effectuate the great object of the grant?

But, it is said, that the General Government cannot exercise exclusive legislation over any place which it may purchase in any State, unless, under the eighth section of the said article, the purchase shall be made, with the consent of the State in which it shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock yards, and other needful buildings. This is not denied. But is there not an obvious difference between procuring property by purchase—holding it, too, under the laws of the State in which it may be, and the exercise of exclusive legislation over it? Such a power over forts, magazines, &c., in the bosom of a State, contrary to its consent, was thought, perhaps, to be dangerous and unnecessary. But what authority was that clause intended to convey? A right to purchase? Certainly not; but to exercise exclusive legislation over the property when purchased with the consent of the States. This clause, so far from proving that the Government cannot purchase property to effectuate Constitutional objects, appears evidently to be predicated upon the previous right to purchase. Express authority is given to lay and collect duties and imposts. To effectuate the collection of imposts, custom-houses are necessary. But is it true that the Government shall not, by contract for the rent of a suitable house, or by purchase, (which would be the same in principle, for, if it can rent, it can purchase,) avail itself of that convenience? When a grant of power is made, all that is necessary to the complete effectuation of the object contemplated passes by implication. And, if this were not a sound rule of construction, (which, however, none will deny,) by the last clause of the section alluded to, authority is expressly given to Congress "to make all laws which shall be necessary for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States." And, sir, the Government is not dependent, as has been stated, upon the will of a State, or even States, to carry into effect the power vested in it by the Constitution. It has been said, to prove its dependence, "that a State might refuse to elect Senators." To be sure, it might refuse, and the Senators might refuse to discharge the duties incumbent on them after they came here. The President might refuse to sign any bill passed by Congress, or to return it with his objections. The people of the State may refuse to elect Representatives, and, indeed, might rise in rebellion against it; but would not all these omissions be a violation of duty, and of the Constitution? Surely, no sound argument of the lack of Constitutional authority on the part of this Government is deducible from the physical power on the part of a State or States to resist that authority.

But how, it is asked, continued Mr. B., shall the Government get such property as may be necessary, unless the owners choose to sell it? How, I ask in reply, shall provisions for the support of our armies be obtained, if the owners should be unwilling to sell them at a fair price? The reply is obvious. They must be taken. No authority is expressly given to do so; nor is any expressly given to quarter soldiers in the houses of our citizens in time of war; but the authority to do each is clearly implied; for it is declared that "no soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, or, in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law." "Nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation." The argument which has been relied upon, that we should violate every rule of justice and morality in being the valuers of the property taken by us, is entirely untenable. When a State deems it expedient to make a road, if it is to pass through the land of one of its citizens, a writ of ad quod damnum issues, and, by the verdict of a jury empanelled for that purpose, the value of the ground is ascertained. The same may be done by this Government, for it may pass all laws necessary and proper to execute the powers confided to it. Such a measure would, however, never be necessary on the part of the General Government. Property can always be purchased, to make such improvements as would be undertaken by it; and, indeed, it should give even more than the value of the property, rather than resort to an exercise of its ultimate power, in such cases. The danger which appears to have been apprehended from such a step is altogether imaginary. It might, to be sure, be perverted to very improper purposes, and so might every power granted. Without even literally violating the Constitution, taxation might be extended beyond endurance, and amount to absolute tyranny; yet the safety of the United States required that no limitation should be affixed to the grant of the power, as it was impossible to foresee the particular point beyond which it should not be extended. Government can no more exist without power than society can exist without laws.

But, said Mr. B., the power to make roads has been clearly given by the clause as to the establishment of post offices and post roads—upon which he intended to make but very few remarks, as it had been fully commented on by others. Many nice definitions had been given of the meaning of the word "establish." It is never used, said a gentleman, when any thing is to be performed which requires physical force. He gave us various illustrations of the ideas which he wished to convey on that point, and so very fine and hair-spun were his distinctions, that we are at a loss to determine whether it was more difficult to comprehend the argument or retain the impression. Let us, however, take one of the examples which he gave. If, said he, authority is given to establish a house of entertainment, could that be construed into an authority to build a house? Suppose that gentleman were applied to for his advice, and a written contract presented to him in which the owner of a tract of land had granted an individual the authority to establish on such tract a house of entertainment, and there was no house on it, or one entirely unfitted for such purpose, would that gentleman say that the lessee should not have a right, at his own expense, to build a suitable house? Would he tell him, after having been busily engaged in investigating the subject, with his law books on one hand and his lexicons on the other, that he could find no place in which the words "to establish" were used to signify "to do any thing which required physical force," and that, unless he could build a house without physical force, he must lose the benefit of his contract? In construing all instruments of writing, of whatever character they may be, is it not more reasonable to understand the words in the sense in which, from a view of the whole instrument, it is reasonable to presume they were intended to be understood?

It has also been urged that the clause referred to gave to the General Government a right of way only; and that any lawyer would acknowledge that a grant of a right of way only, conveyed no interest in the soil; that if, under such circumstances, obstructions were thrown in the way, the grantee had no right even to remove them, but must sue and recover damages. I know that it is not to be inferred, as the opinion of that gentleman, that if, by order of the county courts, every post road was ordered to be closed, and the passage of the mail prevented, the remedy would be by suit; for here a greater difficulty would present itself than in construing the contract "to establish a house of entertainment." Against whom should the suit be commenced? Against the State, or against the worshipful justices of the county court? It is acknowledged by all that the State has no authority to prevent the passage of the United States mail, but yet the county court may refuse to have a post road kept in such a condition as would enable those whose duty it is to carry the mail to get along with it. The General Government, according to this view of the subject, is made to depend for the execution of its power, not on the State alone, but on the will and caprice of a county court. When a road is once made, gentlemen acknowledge that the Government may claim and exercise the right to use it. The State may wish to alter or abolish a road, but this they have no right to do. But we must not make a road. Before the road is made the land belongs to the State, and it would be a dangerous power to permit the United States Government to interfere with its right; but, let the road be once made, and then use it at pleasure, and exercise, too, such authority over it as that the State cannot abolish it, and in this there is no danger. If, Mr. Chairman, this be correct reasoning, I confess it is beyond my comprehension. Not wishing, however, to consume too much of your time, I shall submit the matter without further observations.

When Mr. BUCKNER had concluded—

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, next took the floor in support of the bill, who, at 4 o'clock, yielded to a motion for rising; and, the Committee having obtained leave to sit again, the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 5.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing an additional compensation to William F. Gray, postmaster at Fredericksburg, in Virginia.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States:

I transmit to the House of Representatives a report from the Secretary of State, agreeably to a resolution of that House of the 11th of December last, with the papers which accompanied that report.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 2, 1824.

The said Message was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for obtaining the necessary surveys, estimates, &c., for roads and canals.

Mr. McDUFFIE concluded the speech which he commenced yesterday, in support of the bill. His speech follows entire.

Mr. Chairman: In the course of this discussion, gentlemen have indulged their imaginations in sketching out the most extravagant and fanciful pictures of the abuses which would result from the exercise of the power of making internal improvements by Congress; and, by this sort of inverted reasoning, have attempted to prove that the power does not constitutionally exist in Congress. Nothing can more clearly show the difficulties of the position they have assumed under the Constitution, than the fact that they are compelled to resort to arguments of this description, in order to sustain it: for, I think it can be satisfactorily shown, that it is against the whole theory of our political system, to suppose that the power in question is more liable to be abused by the General Government than similar powers are liable to be abused by the State Governments. With the purpose, therefore, of reclaiming the attention of the Committee from the frightful usurpations gratuitously ascribed to this Government, and of directing it to the sober and dispassionate consideration of the principles really involved in the subject under discussion, I propose to offer a few preliminary remarks, indicating the real securities provided in the Constitution for the liberty of the citizen, and the harmonious operation of our complicated system of Government.

Almost every gentleman who has addressed the Committee in opposition to the proposed measure, has laid down some general proposition, classifying the powers which have been confided, respectively, to the General Government and to the State governments; but it seems to me they have introduced into their several propositions, terms much more vague and uncertain than the question they are intended to elucidate. To lay it down as a general rule, that all municipal powers, not expressly granted to the General Government, belong to the State governments, either renders nugatory most of the powers of this Government, or it does not advance us a single step towards the decision of the question we are discussing. I shall endeavor to bring the mind of the Committee to a direct perception of the things upon which it is to decide, entirely unembarrassed by terms of doubtful signification.

It will be perceived, from a casual glance at the provisions of the Constitution, that two great safeguards are provided for restraining and arresting the usurpations of this Government, and preserving the liberties of the people. One of these results from restrictions upon power; the other from the responsibility of those who exercise power, to the people upon whom it operates. Those particular acts of Government which are essentially wrong, and which no emergency can justify, are absolutely prohibited; and upon those powers which rulers are naturally prone to abuse, because connected with their own defence, and liable to the influence of their passions, positive restrictions are imposed, restraining their exercise to certain specified emergencies. Upon these principles, Congress is prohibited from passing any law respecting the establishment of religion, or tending to abridge the freedom of conscience, of speech, or of the press. Upon the same principles, Congress is prohibited from making either honors or crimes hereditary, by creating titles of nobility, or passing bills of attainder; and, also, from suspending the privileges of the writ of habeas corpus, except under circumstances producing a sort of State necessity for that dangerous exercise of sovereign power. And it is worthy of remark, that the State governments also are subjected to precisely the same positive restrictions, in all cases where the powers under consideration could be fairly presumed to belong to them, under the general distribution. From this we are brought to the obvious conclusion, that the Convention did not regard the State governments as sentinels upon the watch-towers of freedom, or in any respect more worthy of confidence than the General Government. One class of public agents, as they are not exempted from the passions, so they have no claim to be exempted from the restrictions belonging to another class, when both stand in the same relation to the people. It was wise and provident, therefore, to restrain both from the exercise of powers, which are so peculiarly dangerous in their nature. And here, sir, an answer at once suggests itself to a remark, made during this debate, importing that the same principles of construction which justify the exercise of the power to make internal improvements by this Government, go equally to justify the celebrated sedition law. The unconstitutionality of that law resulted from the express provision, "that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." It was a violation of an express restriction upon the power of Congress; and until gentlemen point out a similar restriction upon the power of improving the country and developing its resources, they must abandon the argument, deduced from this analogy, as indefensible. The only effect of introducing such an argument into this discussion, is to awaken associations which do not belong to the subject.

Having thus pointed out the class of powers which is the proper subject of positive restriction, let us inquire what is the principle which governs the distribution of that residuary mass of useful and necessary powers which constitute the sovereignty of the nation, and which every Government, or system of Governments worthy of the name, must exercise by some of its functionaries. In determining whether a given subject of legislation should belong to Congress or to the State Legislatures, the inquiry with the Convention was not, which of these will be most likely to abuse the trust, but to which of them does it appropriately belong, in reference both to their organization and the great objects they were designed to accomplish? It was not a question of civil liberty, but of political harmony. In this view of the subject, I would lay it down as a general rule, that all those subjects of legislation which concern the general interests of the whole Union, which have a plain and obvious relation to the powers expressly granted, and which a single State government cannot regulate, naturally belong to the General Government, unless it can be shown that the regulation of those subjects by Congress impairs the power of the State Legislatures to regulate their own internal police. In laying down this rule, I have been governed by the living principle which pervades and sustains the whole fabric of our complex system of government, political responsibility. This should, in all cases, be co-extensive with political power; and wherever the power of a Government operates upon the interests of those to whom it is not responsible, there is precisely so much despotism. This idea cannot be better illustrated, than by the very subject under consideration. Roads and canals for the transportation of the mail, and for bringing into efficient operation the military power of the nation, are intimately connected with the prosperity, the defence, and the very existence of the Union. The whole people of the United States are, therefore, interested in the execution of works of this description. Let us suppose, then, that the General Government commences a road or a canal for these general and essential purposes, through the State of Delaware, and that the government of that State should interrupt its progress. What would be the political anomaly presented? The government of Delaware, emanating from, and responsible to, forty thousand people only, would be seen controlling the interests of the whole people of the United States, amounting to nearly ten millions? The people of the United States have no representative in the Legislature of Delaware, and, consequently, no means of controlling its operations upon their interests but by the supremacy of the laws of this Government. In the case supposed, therefore, the great interests of this Republic would be subjected to the action of a power having every characteristic of despotism. It is true, it would be a petty despotism, but it would not, on that account, be less despotic in principle. If it would not directly endanger the liberties of the country, it would weaken its energies and embarrass the essential operations of the Government. For, sir, show me, in any of the subdivisions of this comprehensive scheme of representative Governments, a power operating beyond its responsibility, and I will show you a power unknown to the system—a comet, let loose from the power of gravitation, which must inevitably destroy the planetary harmony by which that system is so admirably characterized.

Let us now reverse this picture, and contemplate the operations of the General Government upon the States, in fulfilling the great ends of its creation. What are the principles which lead gentlemen to presume that the rights of the States will be infringed? Is Congress, in its legislative action upon the States, like the State Legislatures in their action upon the United States, irresponsible to those upon whom its power operates? Are not the people of the States represented on this floor, the governments of the States in a co-ordinate branch of the National Legislature, and both, in the chief executive magistracy? And when the concurrence of all these, or of two-thirds of both branches of Congress, is necessary to the passage of any law affecting the rights of the people, or the powers of the States, have we not all the safeguards which human wisdom can provide against the abusive exercise of power? Sir, in the vast field of legislation over which our jurisdiction extends we cannot touch with rudeness a single chord of the body politic whose vibration will not reach every department of this Government. I confidently assert, that this Government is as popular in its organization, and as safe a depository of power, as a State Government.

With the aid of these general principles, I shall proceed to inquire what powers have been actually delegated to Congress, in reference to the subjects embraced in the bill on your table.

I am clearly of the opinion that, under the general power to raise and appropriate money to "promote the common defence and general welfare," Congress has the power to appropriate money for making roads and canals, with the consent of the States in which these works may be executed, without reference to any of the other specific grants of power. As the honorable Speaker has distinctly disclaimed all power over internal improvements derived from this source, I must beg the particular attention of the Committee while I attempt to explain my views on the subject, and remove the misapprehensions which I believe to exist, as to the extent of the power which is claimed under this clause. When I lay it down, that the power of raising and appropriating revenue, like all the other sovereign powers of this Government, is unlimited, unless where expressly restricted, I beg gentlemen not to be alarmed at the proposition, for I will give it such an explanation as will, I think, render it perfectly harmless. The powers to declare war, and to raise and support armies, are certainly as dangerous as any vested in this Government, and yet, it will not be pretended that they are subject to any other limitation than what will be found in the wisdom and discretion of Congress. We have the same power to raise an army of a hundred thousand men in time of peace, when we have occasion for their services, that we have to raise a single regiment in the greatest emergency. And though every one will agree that such a freak of power would be wanton and wicked in the extreme, no one, I presume, would venture to pronounce it unconstitutional. In like manner, I maintain that we have as clear a Constitutional power to raise one hundred millions of revenue, without any reference to the other express grants of power, that we have to raise a single million for the direct purpose of carrying these grants into effect. The fallacy of the arguments of gentlemen on this subject consists in supposing that the Constitution leaves nothing to the discretion of Congress; when, in fact, construe the Constitution as you will, our principal security must depend upon that discretion. In determining what sovereign powers belong to Congress, no discretion, I admit, is given to us. The Constitution is our inflexible landmark. But, in determining in what manner, under what circumstances, and for what purposes, these powers shall be exerted, we have nothing but a sound discretion to direct us. That Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes," we ascertain from the Constitution; but it would be as vain to look into the Constitution for an enumeration of the objects to which the revenue shall be appropriated, as to look into that instrument for the causes which would justify a declaration of war, or for the objects to be accomplished by raising armies or regulating commerce. By a strange misconception, in which the honorable Speaker seems to have participated, the power of appropriating money, in the extent to which I carry it, is supposed to involve a sweeping demolition of all the limitations of the Constitution, rendering this a Government of unlimited powers. Sir, I expressly disclaim these consequences. I deny that the power of raising and appropriating money "draws after it" (to use the language of the Speaker) any power at all. My position is, that Congress has power to raise and appropriate money to carry into effect the other powers expressly granted, and also to promote "the general welfare," so far as it can be promoted by money merely. As a power, it ends in itself. When the money is raised and appropriated, sovereignty ceases; and whatever else is effected must be done by the mere agency of money, in the use of which the Government is precisely upon the footing of an individual. If any sovereign power, besides that of appropriating money, is necessary to accomplish the object, that other power must be derived from some of the other grants of the Constitution; and if it is not found there, it does not exist at all.

That the power of appropriating money is not confined to the execution of the other commercial powers, is as clear, from the terms in which it is conveyed, as from the nature of the power itself. Congress is authorized to "lay and collect taxes" "to provide for the common defence and general welfare." Now, it would be doing great injustice to the critical skill of the Convention to suppose that the significant terms "common defence and general welfare," were introduced for no purpose; and it would be doing equal injustice to their wisdom to suppose that the terms in question were intended to enlarge the powers of the General Government. It seems clear to me that they were intended neither to enlarge nor diminish the powers of Congress, but merely to define and limit the objects to which this particular power should be applied. And I am much indebted to the candor of my honorable friend from Virginia, who sits near me. (Mr. ARCHER,) for the admission, that these words were intended to limit a power, which would have been illimitable without them. I am perfectly satisfied of the correctness of this view, and, while it gives me great pleasure to concur with my friend in the principle, I am compelled to say that it brings my mind to a conclusion precisely the reverse of that which he deduces from it. If the power under consideration would have had no limit without the words "common defence and general welfare," it results of necessity, that we must look to those words only for the limitation. What, then, is it? Congress shall raise and appropriate money, with no other limitation, as to the objects which money alone can effect, but that they must relate to the "common defence and general welfare," and not to any local or State purposes.

Indeed, sir, it may be fairly argued that there would have been no necessity for an express delegation of a power to raise and appropriate money, if it can be applied only to the other granted powers; for, it can scarcely be doubted, that every one of these would carry with it, as an incident, the power of appropriating the money necessary for its execution. That can hardly be a just construction, which would thus convert the leading clause of the Constitution into mere surplusage.

The honorable Speaker seems to be alarmed at the idea of a discretionary power in Congress to appropriate money to "promote the general welfare," and has reminded us of the saying of a military chieftain, who certainly understood the elements of human power, as well as any man who ever wielded them. "Give me money," (said that celebrated man,) and I will obtain bayonets;" and, conversely, "give me bayonets, and I will get money?" Now, if the honorable Speaker had examined the bearing of this military maxim, with the sagacity which usually characterizes the operations of his mind, I think he would have found in it an answer to his own argument, and a perfect relief from all his apprehensions. If the combined powers of money and bayonets, of the purse and the sword, are so fearful, I ask if they do not exist, without limitation, in Congress, by the express grants of the Constitution? That the power of appropriating money is unlimited in reference to all the elements of military power, is a proposition which I am sure will not be questioned. And I am at a loss to conceive how the dangers of the bayonet can be increased by the power of appropriating money to other objects. It is not, sir, the power of appropriating money, but the other powers to which it gives motion, that can be regarded as dangerous. Against the wasteful expenditure of the public money, the Constitution furnishes an ample security in the provision, that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but by the consent of the people, through their immediate representatives. It may at least be said, that if this is not a sufficient security, there can be none; for the field of expenditure is wide enough for all the purposes of extravagance, under any construction which can be given to the Constitution.

Sir, if the view I have taken of the money powers of this Government be not correct, every Administration, and almost every Congress, have been guilty of habitual violations of the Constitution. In the Administration of General WASHINGTON, an appropriation was made to relieve the suffering people of St. Domingo, who had sought a refuge on our hospitable shores; and, in that of Mr. Madison, a similar appropriation was made for the relief of the wretched inhabitants of Caraccas, overwhelmed by the disasters of an earthquake. Neither of these appropriations have the remotest assignable relation to any one of the other enumerated powers, and I challenge any gentleman to justify them under any other clause of the Constitution but that which confers the revenue power. In fact, sir, we cannot perform those every day acts, which are essential to the existence, and involved in the very notion of government, if our power to appropriate money is regarded as merely subservient to the other grants of power. The monuments we have erected to illustrate the gratitude of the nation and the memory of her distinguished citizens; the works of genius and patriotism by which we have decorated the Halls of this Capitol; and the very supplications which are every morning sent up to heaven, invoking its smiles upon our deliberations for the general welfare, are so many emblems of usurpation, if the arguments of gentlemen are correct on this point. We cannot look around us without beholding something to remind us that we have violated the Constitution.

But, sir, there are much stronger precedents than any I have yet stated, on the point under consideration.

Under the Administration of Mr. Jefferson, one of the most distinguished advocates of limited construction, Congress appropriated money for the purchase of a territory sufficiently large for an empire. It will not be pretended that this was authorized by any of the specific grants of power to Congress, if not from that to appropriate money. Whence, then, is the power derived? If the purchase was unconstitutional, an honorable gentleman from Louisiana, whom I trust we shall hear upon this question, has no right to raise his voice in this assembly. If it was Constitutional, as I believe it was, it is in vain to speak of any security against the waste of the public treasure, derived from limiting the objects of expenditure. For the same principle which authorized the purchase of Louisiana, would equally authorize that of Cuba and the islands in the Pacific Ocean; and if nature did not interpose an insuperable barrier, we might go with the honorable Speaker to the planets above us, and there embark in sovereign speculation. But it will be said that the purchase of Louisiana was made by virtue of the Executive power to make treaties. Granted. And what follows? That there is an unlimited power in the Executive Government, not only to authorize Congress to appropriate money, but to impose upon it all the obligation which can grow out of the treaty, to make the appropriation. Sir, this puts an end to the argument which limits the power of appropriating money to the other specific grants to Congress, embraced in the enumeration of its powers. And I must say, it would be an extraordinary supposition that the framers of the Constitution intended to limit, by the most jealous restrictions, the power of the popular branch of the Government, in selecting the objects calculated to promote the general welfare, and, at the same time, to vest in the Executive Government the most unlimited discretion on the same subject.

But, says the honorable Speaker, if we can derive the right of making a road through a State, from the consent of the State, we can derive from it sovereign powers not conferred by the Constitution. If it were contended that the power of appropriating money could be derived from the consent of a State, this objection would, I admit, be unanswerable. The objection, however, is founded upon a misconception. It supposes every act which a Government performs to be, of course, an act of sovereignty. But, nothing can be more erroneous than such a supposition. The making of a road is not an act of sovereignty. The Legislature of Virginia, for example, might grant me the privilege of making a road through the State; but, if they were to do so, I should certainly never dream that I was clothed with any of the attributes of sovereignty. In fact, to deny this General Government a privilege belonging to the humblest citizen within its allegiance, would be to render it an alien enemy in the midst of the people, whose destinies are committed to its charge.

But, Mr. Chairman, though I have deemed it important to show that this Government has the power to execute internal improvements with the consent of the States in which they may be made, I confess I deem it of much more importance to establish its absolute and sovereign power to make such roads and canals as are requisite and proper for giving a salutary efficiency to the great powers expressly conferred upon it, "in order to form a more perfect union," and perpetuate the blessings of liberty. I shall proceed, therefore, to examine briefly the several clauses under which the power in question is claimed, assuring the Committee that I will not trespass upon their indulgence by the repetition of arguments which have been already urged with an ability to which I have no pretensions.

In expounding the meaning and import of the grant "to establish post roads," the gentlemen opposed to this measure have largely availed themselves of those legal subtleties and philological refinements which they have themselves proscribed as unbecoming the nature and gravity of this discussion. I, sir, am decidedly opposed to the introduction of artificial or technical rules into the interpretation of such an instrument as the Constitution of the United States; and I think the friends of this bill would act very unwisely in resting the question of power upon the grammatical import of the term "establish." I agree with my honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) that "to establish" most generally means only to communicate the attributes of permanence and stability; and that, in relation to physical objects, it never means "to make" merely. But, it will be apparent to the gentleman, on a moment's reflection, that it is often used in reference even to physical objects, to convey the two-fold idea of "creating and making permanent." The meaning of the word must depend, in every case, upon the subject-matter to which it relates. An authority, for instance, to establish a post road where a road already exists, would not, in terms, convey a right to make the road; because the language, in its more comprehensive signification, would have nothing upon which to operate. But, an authority to establish a post road through a wilderness would most certainly be interpreted to convey, by the mere force of the terms, the right to make the road, as well as to communicate to it certain legal attributes.

But, sir, in giving a construction to a power of this description, we must ascend to much higher principles than either law books or lexicons can furnish. We must look to the great objects which it was designed to accomplish, and give it such an interpretation as will most effectually promote them. What, then, are those objects? The power to establish post offices and post roads, simple as it may appear, is one of the most important which belongs to Congress. Regarding the vast extent of our country, and the principles of our Government, it is obvious to remark that it is of vital consequence to the liberties of the Republic. It is the representative principle that imparts to this Government the character of freedom. And what can be more essential to the efficient operation of this principle than the rapid and regular transmission of political intelligence from the Seat of Legislation to the remotest extremes of the Union? Even a free press—one of the essential elements of a representative system, of such unprecedented extent as ours—would be comparatively useless without an active and comprehensive system of mail communication. A constant interchange of intelligence and sentiment between the Government and the people is essential to the character of both. It is the diffusion of intelligence from the Government to the people, and the reaction of popular sentiment upon the Government, that renders the citizen really a freeman, and the representative really a responsible agent. I believe, sincerely, that, if the communication of this intelligence were for a length of time cut off from any distant portion of this Union, it would be deprived of the principle of political life, as certainly as a limb of the animal system would perish in which the blood had ceased to circulate. And is it not obvious that there will soon be States in this great Confederacy so remote from the centre that, without the most improved means of communication, Congress may meet and adjourn before a single interchange of sentiment can take place between the representative and his constituents? Sir, I am sure no member of the Committee can be insensible to the importance of these considerations. And, in ascertaining the extent of a power designed for such high purposes, shall we contract our views to a mere philological disquisition upon the import of the word "establish?" Admitting that this word must receive the restricted meaning ascribed to it by some gentlemen, I contend, upon a higher principle than any yet assumed, that the power to establish post offices and post roads involves as an incident the right to make them. And I confess I have been not a little surprised that, while all the other grants in the Constitution are admitted to involve incidental powers, this should be regarded as an exception. Without this incidental power, the principal power might be rendered nugatory, either by the caprice of a State government, or by the obstacles of nature. To contend, therefore, that we cannot make post roads, because "to establish" does not mean "to make," is not more reasonable than it would be to maintain that this Government cannot make war because "to declare" does not mean "to make."

I believe every gentleman who has opposed, in this debate, the power of Congress to make post roads, has distinctly admitted its right to exercise a conservative power over such existing roads as it may establish. This, indeed, is clearly embraced in the idea of giving firmness and stability, which enters into their definition of the word "establish." Now, sir, if this Government has the power to maintain and keep up a road, against the consent of a State, and to prevent, by the highest sanctions, any obstructions, even if attempted under the authority of a State, I would be thankful to any gentleman who would present an intelligible idea of the additional act of sovereignty exerted in making a road. As relates to the question of sovereignty, the power to maintain a road, against the will of a State, is precisely the same as the power to make it—with this difference in point of fact, that the latter exercise of power would be generally more beneficial to the States.

But, I would ask the gentlemen on the opposite side of this question, whether this Government has not a right, and has not invariably exercised it when necessary, to erect buildings for the use of the post office establishment? They have not only the right to purchase the soil for the purpose of erecting a post office, without the consent of a State, but they have a right to take it without the consent of the owner, and with no other restriction than that prescribed in the Constitution, that "just compensation shall be made." Now, if the power to establish a post office involves the incidental right to make it, the power to establish a post road, involves the right to make that also. It would be an utter perversion of every just principle of construction, to ascribe to the same word two different meanings, as applied to two subjects standing in precisely the same relation to it, and in the same sentence.

I will now proceed, Mr. Chairman, to consider those clauses of the Constitution which confer upon this Government the power to declare and prosecute war. The obvious, and, indeed, the express intention of these clauses was, to clothe this Government with the whole military power of the nation; to enable it to provide for "the common defence and general welfare" of the Republic.

To suppose that the framers of the Constitution intended to confer upon Congress the power to declare war, and to deny to it the means of giving to that power the most efficient operation, is, in effect, to suppose they intended to impose a duty upon Congress, and withhold the means of performing it. But gentlemen deny that roads and canals can be fairly regarded as the means of prosecuting war. Sir, I am perfectly willing to rest this question upon the rule laid down by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. P. P. BARBOUR,) who opened the debate in opposition to the bill. He says that no act of the Government can be justified, as the means of carrying into effect any power of the Government which has not a "direct and appropriate relation" to the ends which that power was intended to accomplish. Now, if it cannot be satisfactorily shown that roads and canals have a "direct and appropriate relation" to the military defence of the country, I will surrender the whole argument. Sir, what is the situation of this country, in reference to its capacity for defence? There is not a nation on earth abounding so much in the elements of strength, that is so much weakened by their diffusion. And every one knows that not only the increased energy, but the very existence of military power depends upon the concentration of these elements. If, by a judicious system of roads and canals, we double the facilities for military movements, and the rapidity with which the forces of the country may be brought to bear upon an invading force, we increase, in nearly the same degree, our defensive power. If, by the same means, we enable the Government to transport arms, munitions, troops, and subsistence, for one-fourth of the price it would now cost, we quadruple the power of the country, so far as money is to be regarded as an element of military power. These hypothetical cases, so far from being extravagant, are short of the reality. If this were not apparent, from a mere inspection of the map of the country, it could not fail to be deeply impressed upon us by the disastrous experience of the recent war with Great Britain. We cannot have forgotten the waste of life and treasure, which was sustained on the Northwestern frontier, principally for the want of facilities of transportation. The extraordinary expenses of a single campaign, (in which flour cost the Government upwards of one hundred dollars a barrel,) arising from this deficiency, would defray the expense of the most important of the roads and canals contemplated for military purposes. Can it, then, be doubted that roads and canals have a direct and appropriate relation to the military defence of the country? Let us suppose, sir, that any one, or a combination, of the great Powers of the world, should wage a war of extermination against this Republic. I will not undertake to say how probable such an event may be, or how remote; but, in discussing the Constitutional power of this Government to defend the country, we are bound to regard all those combinations and vicissitudes of human affairs, of which history furnishes so many examples. Upon what, then, would our safety, and even our existence, depend, if those combinations and vicissitudes should cover our coasts with the hosts of an invader, aiming to extinguish, in blood, the light of our example? Sir, the whole power of the country would be called in requisition; and I need not say how much of that power, both as it regards men and subsistence, lies beyond the mountains. In an emergency, such as I have supposed, at least a fourth part of the military energies of the Republic would be almost entirely unavailing for all the purposes of its defence and preservation, without the improvements here contemplated. Indeed, the power of this Government to make roads and canals for military purposes, is so obvious that my friend from Virginia (Mr. ARCHER) has, with his characteristic candor, distinctly admitted it; but, he contends, that the roads and canals contemplated in this bill, are not of that description. Now, I perfectly agree with him that if, under the pretext of making military roads and canals, Congress were to assume the power of making them for purposes not military, it would be an act of usurpation. The powers of this Government must be honestly exercised; and, although I cannot perceive any principle upon which the judiciary could pronounce any road unconstitutional, (if I may be permitted so to characterize a road;) yet, I admit that the conscience of every member is a tribunal, before which he must be able to justify his vote, in each particular exercise of the power in question.

An honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr.

H. OF R.

Rives,) who favored us with an argument of great ingenuity, and to which I listened with unusual pleasure, has told us, that if we assimilate a military road to a fortification, we may, with a little more license of the imagination, say, that bread, and even the hearts of our citizens, are fortifications. I trust, sir, there is more of fact than of fancy in this. And, I would ask the honorable gentleman, if he means to deny the power of this Government to provide bread for the sustenance of its armies, or to call into requisition the hearts and the blood of its citizens, for their common defence?

Driven from the ground of precise Constitutional investigation, gentlemen have conjured up a phantom which they denominate consolidation; and which I shall now endeavor to exorcise. And I should be glad if some of them would favor us with a precise idea of what they mean by consolidation. If they mean by it a firm and indissoluble union of the States, I for one, am decidedly in favor of it; but, if they mean by it the annihilation of the State governments, or the destruction of a single power that appropriately belongs to them, there is no man who disapproves of it more, and I will add, who fears it less than I do.

If gentlemen will attentively examine the organization and structure of our Government, they will perceive that a consolidation, in this sense of the term, cannot possibly take place. What, sir? Annihilate the State governments! when one of the branches of the National Legislature is absolutely dependent upon them, and the other emanates from the very same people who create those governments! Usurp the powers of the State governments! when this Government could not exercise them if it would, and would not exercise them if it could! Gentlemen have deluded themselves by the vague generalities in which they have indulged, and have triumphantly asked, What may this Government not do, if it has power to make internal improvements? Sir, I would ask, in reply, What may this Government not do, under any construction, which they would themselves give to the Constitution? For, I must be permitted to say, that, if the liberties of the Republic are in any danger from the powers of this Government, it is from those expressly granted. It has, in the power of war and peace, the absolute and unlimited command of every thing that can fascinate human ambition, or impose upon the imaginations of mankind. If any thing can draw it from the appropriate sphere of its duty, it is the seductive charm of military glory. But this is not all. In the power to suppress insurrections, it may bring the military force of the nation to operate, under mere colorable pretexts, directly upon the lives and liberties of the people. And if these powers are harmless, I am at a loss to perceive what there is to alarm us, in those that remain. If my views of our system of Government are not entirely erroneous, our liberties do not depend so much upon the quantity as upon the kind of power vested in our respective public functionaries—nor upon either of these, so much as upon the efficient responsibility of those functionaries to the people.

Destroy this tie, and any portion of power, however small, will soon be sufficient for all the purposes of despotism. Subject to its control, the ordinary powers of Government, which constitute sovereignty, are both safe and salutary. Indeed, I am satisfied that the proposition, that power is essential to liberty, will be found to be philosophically true, upon the fullest examination. You cannot annihilate sovereign power with impunity. If it cannot operate through the Government, it will operate through other channels, and the Government will sink under its own debility. Most of the free Governments, both of ancient and modern times, have fallen a sacrifice to the mistaken idea, that liberty derives its security, not from the responsibility of power, but from its limitations.

But, I trust I shall not be understood, while maintaining the complete sovereignty of this Government, in relation to the great objects of its creation, to underrate the importance of the State governments, or to claim for the General Government the right of interfering, in any respect, with their power and jurisdiction. What are the subjects of their power and jurisdiction? The property, the life, the person, and the character of the citizen, and the general improvement of the State. I would not extend the power of this Government so as to impair that of the State governments, in relation to any of these subjects, or any other embraced in the internal police of the States. What, sir, will be the effect of the very measure we are discussing, in this respect? Can internal improvements, of a national kind, by any possibility, impair the power of the State through which they pass, to make similar improvements? Their concurrent power would, on the contrary, be capable of producing much greater results, and nothing but a spirit of reckless caprice, which cannot be imputed to the State governments, could induce them to resist the incidental co-operation of the General Government, in works so essentially beneficial to themselves. Sir, I am utterly incapable of perceiving a solitary power of a State government, which would not exist in as ample a manner during the progress of a national work within its jurisdiction, as if such work had never been even projected.

But, an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) has informed the Committee that the people are alarmed on this subject, and has warned us of the danger of alienating their confidence from this Government. I trust, sir, I duly estimate the high character of Virginia for intelligence and patriotism, but the gentleman must excuse me for saying that I cannot regard Virginia as the barometer of the national feeling on this question. And when we advert to the fact that a decided majority of Congress has for many years been perseveringly attached to this system of improvement, it would seem to be a matter of some difficulty for the gentleman to make out the evidence of the dissatisfaction and alarm of which he speaks. Indeed, if I may be allowed to express an opinion on the subject, I doubt whether the people, even of Virginia, have any of those apprehensions which some of their Representatives entertain on this subject. The course of argument which denies to this Government the power to make internal improvements is too refined and metaphysical for the comprehension of the people; and, as far as my own observation has extended, it is almost entirely confined to politicians. Tell a plain man that the Government has not this power, and you strike him with astonishment. He will be utterly at a loss to understand upon what principle a Government having so much power to do evil should be deprived of the power of doing good. And, after all, common sense is the safest guide in the construction of this Constitution. It originated with the people, was designed for the people, and we shall best fulfil its ends by expounding its provisions and administering its powers upon those broad and obvious principles which the people can clearly comprehend.

Surveys for Roads and Canals.

H. OF R.

I have no reason to apprehend, Mr. Chairman, that the attention of the Committee has been so exclusively directed to the abstract question of power, that they have lost sight of many of the considerations which recommend the adoption of the measures under consideration, on the score of expediency. With the indulgence of the Committee, I will offer a few remarks on this latter view of the subject.

A gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) has told us, with a manner of utterance which forbids us to misunderstand his object, that measures of this description will make this a splendid Government! I trust, sir, that words can have no magical influence on our deliberations on this grave question; and I confess that I can collect no distinct or intelligible idea from the expression to which I have just alluded. What does the gentleman mean by a splendid Government? Does he mean a Government which takes an enlarged and comprehensive view of the great interests of our common country, and wisely provides means for their development? Does he mean a Government which applies the revenue of the country, not to the gratification of its own ambition, but to the promotion of the happiness, the wealth, and the security of the people? If such be his meaning, I hope this will never cease to be a splendid Government. If such be not his meaning, the expression can have no application to the measure with which it has been associated. No gentleman has ventured to question the importance of internal improvements, as a means of promoting the wealth and prosperity of the country. This has long since ceased to be a question in every civilized nation in the world. But it is contended that this Government is not capable of executing works of this description, with the same judgment, skill, and economy, as the State governments.

Sir, the roads and canals contemplated by this bill, will be of an extent which will render it impossible for the State governments to execute them. If, therefore, they are not made by this Government, they will not be made at all. But gentlemen are certainly mistaken in supposing that internal improvements, of any kind, can be more skilfully and cheaply executed by the State governments, than by this Government. A State government, I admit, is more capable of determining what improvements will promote the peculiar interests of the State, for the same reason that this Government is more capable of determining what improvements will promote "the general welfare" of the whole Union. But, as relates to their comparative competency for skilful execution, it would be extraordinary if the General Government had not the advantage. It has already in its service a corps of scientific engineers, and is possessed of superior resources and opportunities for commanding the first talents of the country, or of the world, if necessary. It can cast its eye over the whole Union, and combine and concentrate the results of the experience of all the States. In a word, it has all the advantages which more abundant resources, superior intelligence, and a more comprehensive view of the improvements already made in this and other countries, can confer upon it. Very few of the States have much practical knowledge on the subject. It is within my own knowledge that in that which I have the honor in part to represent, vast sums of money have been expended, with very little skill or economy. It is not to be expected, indeed, that any Government can carry on undertakings of this kind, with the minute economy which is practicable in those of a private nature, in which individual interest holds a constant check upon extravagance. But, in this respect, Government is Government. All are equally liable to imposition, and if the objection I am considering were substantial, it would arrest the progress of internal improvements altogether. The fallacy of this argument, as well as of most of those urged by the gentleman from Virginia, consists in the supposed exemption of the State governments from the frailties and imperfections which are incident to all Governments.

But, Mr. Chairman, we are urged to the adoption of this system of internal improvements, by considerations growing out of the peculiar character of our Government, infinitely more important than any which relate merely to the economy of national wealth. There is not upon the face of the earth a nation so deeply and vitally interested in the improvement of the facilities of internal communication, as the United States; for, whatever differences of opinion may prevail upon other subjects, all of us must agree that our hopes of reaching the high and happy destinies for which Providence seems to have formed this country and this Government, absolutely depend upon the preservation of the Union. And what are the sources from which danger is to be apprehended in this particular? Dissimilarity of interests, suspension of social and commercial intercourse, and a consequent alienation of feeling among the great geographical subdivisions of the country. Intercourse is the only effectual preventive. This, sir, is not a matter of mere speculation. The most salutary effects have resulted from the intercourse between the Northern and

H. OF R.

Southern States; an intercourse founded upon commercial and other accidental relations, and facilitated by the channels provided by nature. So palpable has been the effect of this intercourse in correcting mutual prejudices, that it cannot have escaped the most careless observer. Without this, it is impossible to say what would have been the effect of our political divisions, in a crisis which has happily passed away, or what would now have been the state of feeling existing between the Northern and Southern portions of this Union. But, united as they are by the strong ties of interest, consecrated by social kindness and mutual good offices, these portions of the Union can never separate.

But, sir, there is, in another direction, danger which cannot be disguised. No statesman, of enlarged views and patriotic feelings, can look with indifference upon the situation of the Western country, and the relation it bears to this Union. It is an old maxim that rivers unite nations, but mountains separate them. And why is it so? Because rivers facilitate intercourse and mountains prevent it. I trust I shall not be misunderstood in what I say of the Western States, on this delicate subject. There is no portion of this Union (I make no exception) more justly distinguished for lofty and patriotic feelings than the Western States. Nor is there any portion of the Union, at this time, more ardent and devoted in its attachment to the General Government. But what produces this attachment? The ties of consanguinity, and the power of youthful associations. Few of the citizens, who constitute the governing power in those States, can look around them for the tombs of their fathers. These depositories of the dead, and many living objects of their affectionate remembrance, are, yet awhile, on this side of the mountains. But time is gradually weakening these ties of nature, and, when a few generations more shall have passed away, the bond of affiliation which now unites them to us will be entirely dissolved. With these impressive facts before us, we should be unworthy of the high trust confided to us, if we did not endeavor, by a provident forecast, to substitute new principles of attachment for those which must so soon cease to operate.

Let us, then, provide the substantial ties of commercial interest. It is my deliberate opinion, that, if the entire commercial supplies of the Western States should be permanently derived through the port of New Orleans, and no commercial intercourse should subsist between them and the Atlantic States, it would be impossible for all the power of parchment and political organization to hold this Union together for half a century longer. In this view of the subject, I have often reflected that the difficulties incident to the navigation of the Gulf of Mexico, and of the river Mississippi, were kindly intended by Providence to promote our union and greatness. I rejoice that those difficulties do exist; and, I trust, we shall be wise enough to improve them to our advantage. Let us, then, cut down and level the mountains, not like the Persian tyrant, to subjugate nations, but in order to achieve a more glorious conquest—the subjugation of our own mutual prejudices. Sir, in whatever light we view these improvements, whether in reference to the diffusion of intelligence, the increase of the defensive power of the country, or the perpetuation of the Union, they are as essential to our existence and prosperity as a nation as the veins which give circulation to the principle of animal life are to the health and vigor of the animal system.

There is another view of this subject to which I shall merely call the attention of the Committee, having neither time nor strength for its full development. An attentive examination of the philosophy of national character and national greatness will lead us to the conclusion that the common efforts and common sacrifices of the whole people, made with a view to some great national object, are absolutely indispensable to the existence of these attributes. Hence, the influence of war in calling into action sentiments of patriotism and nationality, and the tendency of peace to cause these lofty principles of action to degenerate into selfishness and a want of public spirit. Sir, what would this nation be without those military achievements, which are so many monuments of our common exertions? Strike from the record of history the heroic deeds of our ancestors, and the more recent events which illustrate the valor and patriotism of the present generation, and the people of these United States would be reduced to a mere multitude of human beings, animated by no common principle, and united by no common sympathies, destitute of those moral characteristics and sentiments, without which all the physical elements of power and greatness cannot constitute a nation. But, sir, I trust that military achievements are not the only means of giving us national character and national sentiments. Let us substitute moral for military glory; the achievements of national industry, directed by an enlightened policy to the great improvements contemplated by this bill, for achievements involving much more painful sacrifices, and productive of less durable benefits to the country. Let us create, by our common toil and common treasure, some great monuments of the enterprise of the nation, which the people of this Union will contemplate with a common pride and regard as their common property. Sir, it is impossible to estimate the value of these improvements. I will not say they will make this Union perpetual; for the frailty and imperfection of every thing human forbids us to indulge that hope. But I will say that if we wisely improve our advantages in this respect, human sagacity cannot point out any probable cause which will produce a separation of the States. But if, unhappily, it should ever be our destiny to divide, and if our liberties should perish in the convulsion, let us at least leave, for the admiration of posterity, some memorials that the Republic has not existed in vain.

When Mr. McDUFFIE had concluded—

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Tennessee, addressed the House. Notwithstanding the thinness of the Committee, he said he should now take the liberty of presenting, briefly, his views on this interesting subject. At the outset of this discussion, said Mr. R., I intended to have given a silent vote, until I reflected that, some six or seven years ago, I had the honor to mingle in debate on this very topic. And, lest my constituents might suppose that I had become less zealous in their cause, to whom I owe much, is a very great consideration of my now engaging the attention of this patient and attentive Committee. On the debate in 1817 on the bonus bill, the gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) who brought it forward, satisfied my mind that we have the power contended for.

Sir, when we look back at the situation of the country, and mark the defects of the old Confederation, and view with delight the great abilities of those worthies who penned this Constitution, what must have been their reflections on the subject now before us, when they sat down to consider of the great and prominent features of our Government, as afterwards presented in this instrument? They were men of the first talents and patriotism to be found in any country. They were well versed in the history of other nations. They felt and knew how beneficial and how largely internal improvements contributed to the glory and renown of ancient Greece and Rome; and, also, the great utility and importance those great works are to modern Europe. Look at England, France, and Germany—the great facilities derived by the goodness of the means of their conveyance. Those great men also saw, in prospect, their country destined to be as great and flourishing as any that had gone before it. And yet gentlemen gravely contend that they never intended to give to Congress a supreme and absolute power to make post roads. But the road previously made by the States, and afterwards becoming a mail route, should then be adopted and made the post road. This is the position taken by the first gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) who opened the debate, and for whose talents I have a great respect. But, sir, we are not left to conjecture, or to assume the power by implication. It is actually given by the Constitution. In the enumerated powers granted to Congress in the 8th section, Congress shall have the power “to establish post offices and post roads.” Now, surely this does not imply any thing like adoption of roads. For what does the word establish mean? It signifies, most certainly, to create, make firm, build, settle firmly, &c. Now, it is admitted, on all hands, that none of the States have the power to establish a post office. The adversaries of the bill yield the point that Congress has the exclusive power. Then, if Congress has it, which no one can deny, how absurd it is to say that she can establish a post office in any part of the Union, but has no power to make a road leading to it. But my honorable friend from Kentucky (Mr. CLAY) has most eloquently and ably answered this part of the objection. But other gentlemen from Virginia have spoken against the bill, and they are so many I cannot distinguish them, as I did not regularly take notes of their arguments; indeed, I believe all of Virginia is against the measure, except an honorable member (Mr. MERCER) now in my eye, and my honorable friend (Mr. J. S. BARBOUR) who spoke the other day.

Sir, those gentlemen come forward as the champions of the Constitution and the defenders of State rights. I am by no means displeased at the opposition. It is such eloquent appeals to the passions and the understanding, and the honest difference of opinion, zealously enforced as to what is the proper construction of the Constitution, that is to preserve it and hand it down to the latest posterity unhurt. In the very threshold of our inquiry, we are called upon to encounter the celebrated resolutions drawn up by Mr. Madison, and adopted by the Virginia Legislature, against the alien and sedition laws. Now, no man venerates those resolutions, and the author of them, more than I do; but I submit it to the gentlemen of the long robe, from Virginia, whether any thing said beyond answering the unconstitutionality of those obnoxious laws, which the author expressly sat down to combat, should be taken as a rule, and whether the residue of the resolutions should not be considered as extra-judicial, as the lawyers would term it?

Sir, to be serious, we ought to look at the great excitement which produced those decrees. A little while before their existence, the Presidential election had taken place. The favorite son and statesman of Virginia had been beaten. The Federal Government had, indeed, at that period, assumed a high tone. A navy was to be erected, a standing army to be raised, and a war with France, our then natural ally, was expected. And, to crown the climax of federal power, the alien and sedition laws were passed. Sir, the excitement was strong and indignant, and must have entered into the feelings and spirit of the writer of those resolutions, and the other politicians of the day. The gentleman, therefore, will excuse me, if I do not place the same implicit reliance on the expositions of the Constitution by that able and eminent statesman at that time, as I now do on his practical opinions, written with more deliberation, and when he was in supreme authority. For the purpose of the argument, then, I place his glorious and beneficial Administration against the construction now contended for in those resolutions.

Mr. Chairman, permit me now to notice very briefly, some of the objections made to the bill by gentlemen on the other side. And the honorable gentleman, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) who is not now in his seat, and whom I hear always with the greatest delight, warned us, that the States could very easily put an end to this Government, by refusing to send Senators to the other House, and electing Electors for the President and Vice President of the United States. Sir, this Government may be dissolved in many other ways. The States might prevent the revenue of the United States from being collected, and also prohibit their militia from turning out to fight the battles of the country. And there are many other modes, which certainly would require no ghost to tell, by which this Government would lose its Federal head. But,

H. OF R.

I pray God, that those extreme cases may never happen. Sir, they never will take place while the people are virtuous and enlightened. That honorable gentleman again made another strong appeal to our fears, and brought before our imaginations the immortal Patrick Henry. Sir, the abuse of a delegated grant by no means proves that it should never be brought into operation. We might as well contend, that, because Congress has the power to create navies, raise armies, and lest, at any time, the power might be abused, you shall neither build a ship, or enlist a man, however strong and emergent the case might be. So, although you have the power to make roads, lest that power may at any time possibly be abused, you shall make none. Sir, this mode of reasoning would just exactly keep us where we are, unless in the growth and increase of children! All the powers granted to Congress are to be exercised with discretion and wisdom. It never was meant, that because Congress has the power to borrow money, raise a navy, and an army, &c., that she shall act contrary to the general welfare and security of the people. When this is attempted, the corrective is not in the Constitution, but in them. It could not then be the intention of the framers of that instrument, that all our revenue, for instance, should be lavished on roads for the purpose of having them as fine and splendid as in countries which have flourished these eight or nine centuries. No! We must act with wisdom, according to the means in our power, and improve and make our roads gradually. Another honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) admitted you had the power to establish the post office, but asked, with a kind of triumph, has Congress the right to build the house for the post office? Sir, it generally happens, that those appointments are given to householders, who keep the office in their own apartments. But I contend that Congress has the power to build the house, as a resulting and necessary incident to the grant, as she would have to provide for the clothing of an army after it is raised. For, you will remark, that the Constitution is silent as to the clothing, yet I take it for granted, that that part of the instrument which gives Congress the power to make laws "necessary and proper for carrying the foregoing powers into execution," never intended we should have a naked army, and our post office kept out of doors!

Another honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES,) who has, for the first time, favored the Committee with a very ingenious speech, has told you, that all the delegated powers given by the Constitution, were designed to result to the benefit of the whole, and contended, that the case put by my honorable friend, (Mr. CLAY,) in keeping the river Mississippi clear of all obstructions for steam navigation, &c., does not apply. I think differently; for what will mutually benefit a part, will operate as an interest to the whole. It is not, however, necessary to demonstrate this position: for it must be admitted, that the establishment of good roads is of great benefit, in both times of peace and war, to all the States. The gentleman also contended, that military roads were not essential to the operations of war. Sir, whether they are essential or not, good roads are the means of facilitating the movements of armies, and will enable them to co-operate with each other; and may often be of the utmost importance to concentrate those armies with the greatest rapidity, at a given point. The gentleman was also pleased to talk of physical roads, and legal roads, and I expected to have heard something said, metaphorically, about moral roads! Sir, such refinement in reasoning on a great Constitutional question, is beyond my comprehension, particularly when I look at the words of the grant under consideration, and the end we ought to have in view.

But, it has been contended, sir, by gentlemen, in this debate, that, by assuming this power, you will encroach on State rights, and in time bring about a consolidation. And, it has been said, with a degree of triumph, that, if you pass this bill, with similar ones, you will assume the right of regulating the descent of property, and legislate on all the affairs of the States. Gentlemen may dismiss their fears on this subject. The mere local and municipal regulations of the States would have no charms in this House. Let us examine, for a moment, what inducement there could be to gentlemen to bring about a consolidation. For instance, would the gentleman from Virginia be at all willing to make laws about the inspection of tobacco, in this House, and all the other concerns of the State? And how would the gentleman like to have committees raised, gravely to inquire how much of the blue laws in a State were in force? Or, to come more nearer home, how would gentlemen like to be attending to petitions from different parts of the country, pro and con, on the subject of navigable streams, and then wisely enacting, that it shall be highly penal to throw up any fishing dams, or other obstructions, on such a water course, that would not drown a chicken? Sir, these are not the objects of ambition, nor of national legislation, and, in the nature of things, never can be; because there would neither be time or inclination, to attend to the local affairs of the States. Sir, it is the great questions on finance, commerce, war, and negotiation, that properly belong to Congress, and to which statesmen cling, and with them, ambition delights to dwell. And how, I ask, would a fine road, passing through the States, destroy their powers? But the jurisdiction that would be exercised by the United States, is another great bugbear held out. Sir, I would be perfectly willing that it should be considered that the States have complete jurisdiction over all crimes and offences committed on those roads. The improvements of the country ought not to be retarded a moment, on this consideration. In either jurisdiction, justice would be administered. But, on account of the vicinage, I should be in favor of the State courts.

I cannot, Mr. Chairman, think it is possible, that the framers of the Constitution ever intended to have any of the powers granted to Congress to be dependent and under the control of any other power on earth, and more particularly the Post Office Department. Now, it is said by gentlemen, that the State roads shall be the post roads. Well, I ask, what State or States, between this city and New Orleans, ever laid out a road directly to that point? None. The States, make roads from courthouse to courthouse, on which the mail is carried. And sometimes, instead of this road going directly to the southern point, it is carried to every point on the compass, to suit the convenience of the State. Such a state of things never entered the mind of those worthies who are the authors of this instrument. For, surely, no department in our Government is of more importance than this one. To insure the rapid and safe transportation of the mail, is of the first importance to any country. In peace, it carries the intelligence of the country, both of a civil and commercial nature; and, in time of war, of what infinite importance it is to the Government to know, speedily, by the means of roads and canals, the operations of our armies and fleets, and the movements also of the enemy. In the last war, much was lost, for the want of the facilities of rapid movements. Why, in a commercial point of view, a few hours of tardy motion of the mail, by reason of bad roads, may be the ruin of many merchants. How much more important is it, to have the means of rapid communications in time of war, when the liberties of your country are at stake. Let gentlemen pause, and reflect to what direful consequences their nice metaphysical reasoning may lead them. Disarm this Government of its legitimate powers, and my word for it, your disjointed and jealous States would not remain any time in common concert. All the powers of a thousand Patrick Henrys, headed by my honorable friend, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) would not save them from a total dissolution.

I should now say a word as it regards the other branch of the subject, but this has been so ably discussed by the honorable gentleman from Delaware, (Mr. McLANE,) and others, that it would be trespassing too much on your patience to dwell much longer on it. "To regulate commerce among the several States," means a communication and intercourse with the States. This must be carried on by land and water. Then, there ought to be roads and canals. Who ought to make them? Why, Congress ought to have the power, for the general welfare and security of the whole; and the States, most indubitably, have a concurrent power. For, what is commerce? It is the exchange of one commodity for another. It is trade and traffic among the citizens of a State, and with the respective States. In this point of view, it is of infinite importance to agriculture. It would furnish the agriculturist with great facilities to market. Is not this of the first moment in this branch of our economy? And have not the arts and sciences, lately discovered still more important facilities to mankind in their intercourse with each other? And why not embrace them? Does not God and nature command us to do so? If the mail, for instance, can be carried from this Capitol to the city of New Orleans in six or seven days, by steam, would it not be the height of folly to continue it on the land route, that, at least, takes one month in its performance? But, sir, I shall detain you no longer on the Constitutional question. I believe you have full powers to pass the bill on your table. But the expediency of the measure is another and different question, on which the Committee, I trust, will pardon me in saying a few words. I certainly agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RANDOLPH,) that the public debt ought to be paid off before we get on a large scale of national improvements. Then, if we can retain a surplus, after meeting the current expenses, I say dispose of it in this way. But, sir, we have little encouragement to cut out more work, when we look at the Cumberland road. It has now been in progress for twelve or thirteen years, and not yet completed. Why not ask for as much money as will finish the surveying and making this road to its place of destination?

If the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERCER) will exhibit an estimate of the probable expenses of tracing and surveying the ground of his contemplated canal, I shall vote for it with pleasure. I think the sum of thirty thousand dollars is too much in this bill. I am willing to begin this great work with twenty thousand dollars, although I would much rather have the work to be done specified in the bill. I have no idea of shifting our responsibility on the President's shoulders. We give him a gross sum of money, to be paid to engineers and others, whose interest it will be to expend the whole sum in surveys, &c., that may not be sought for (and, when inquired after, obliterated) for a century. And, indeed, in contemplating this subject, we ought to look to what the probable state of the Treasury will be two years from now.

As I am in favor of the principle of the bill, I am not very solicitous at what point you commence the great work of internal improvements. Although I am aware that less has been done for the West than any other portion of the Union, yet we shall not complain. It is submitted, however, with great respect, whether we ought not to finish the Cumberland road before we commence any other. When finished, it will display the powers of a great people, and command the admiration of strangers. This road will open a direct intercourse with the most remote parts of the Northwestern territory of the Republic, passing through six States from the Capitol. In a word, my opinion, as it regards the discretion of Congress in making roads, is this—I do not think it would be wise policy to make all the roads in a State, that might be required. There ought to be a great leading road from this city to the South, say New Orleans. Then one to the North; then to the East and West, in like manner. The States would take a pride in riveting the Union, in making fine roads to intersect and communicate with those of the Republic. In this way, we would be enabled to have intercourse with the most remote parts of the country. And, in times of war, those roads, called post roads, and not military roads, would afford the greatest facilities to the progress and success of our armies. Those great channels of communication, roads and canals, will be the means, no doubt, of drawing the States more closely together. It will be the great means of disseminating the intelligence of the country, with the rapidity of lightning, almost. It will awaken the dormant intellect and moral strength of the nation. In one word, it will be the cause of cementing and linking the States together, and, instead of consolidating them, it will more clearly mark and define the powers of each, and render them, I trust, perpetual; in the General Government and the States moving on in the utmost harmony, each revolving in its proper sphere.

Mr. SPAIGHT, of North Carolina, rose to express his opposition to the bill, and succinctly to give the reasons of that opposition. The lateness of the period of discussion, said he, ought, perhaps, to prevent me from saying any thing. I hope, however, the Committee will pardon me for trespassing, for a very short time, upon their patience. If this Government had sprung into existence from a state of nature; if it had derived its being immediately from the people; then, from its very nature, it would have the power contended for; it would have been inherent by the very formation of the Government. For, to create a National Government, would necessarily, unless restricted by the people, give it all the powers and attributes of sovereignty. These would arise necessarily, ex vi termini. But this is not the character of this Government. Instead of deriving its existence immediately from the people, it was called into being by sovereigns. It is the work of sovereigns—the grant of power by them for their own benefit and that of their people. As this Government derives its existence and powers by grant, it behoves the advocates of this bill to show that the Government has the power. To point out this power in the charter which gives it existence; to show it in the Constitution of the United States. I deny the power. If it is given, it is by express grant, or it is necessary and proper to carry into effect some expressly granted power. Is it expressly granted?

There is no clause in the Constitution mentioning that the General Government has the power to make roads and canals. But, sir, gentlemen say it is expressly granted to the General Government to make roads, for the Constitution gives Congress the power “to establish post offices and post roads;” and that, under the power “to establish post roads,” Congress have power to make roads for the conveyance of the mail. That “establish” means “create,” “make.” All, however, agree that the power to make canals is an implied one. If we look for the definition of “establish,” we find it means “to fix,” “to build up,” “to make firm.” In my estimation, the meaning which is given it in that section of the Constitution; “to designate,” “to fix,” and “to establish post roads”—only gives power to designate or fix the route upon which the mail shall go; “to point out” the place from which it shall be carried, and the place to which it shall be conveyed. The Government, in its legislation upon the mails, gives it the same definition. Gentlemen rely upon the use of the word “establish,” in the preamble of the Constitution, to strengthen their definition of the word. “To establish justice,” say they, means create justice. Justice is the accordance of action with law; the concurrence of action with the rules promulgated for its government. It is coeval and co-extensive with law, divine, natural, and human. It is morally existent. To establish justice means to point out the means by which justice will be secured. In my opinion, gentlemen could not have selected a worse example to illustrate their position. Gentlemen say, Congress must have the power to make roads to convey the mail upon; for there may be no road, and Congress cannot, in that case, have the mails carried between such places as they may think necessary, unless they have power to make a road. In every country there will be roads; in every settlement the inhabitants must and will have the means of communication with each other. Roads must, necessarily, be made in every settled part of the country. The object of the mails is to diffuse information through the community, and the roads made in each community or settlement certainly afford an inlet for that information, for they abundantly afford the means of intercourse and communication. Suppose, say gentlemen, a State were to shut up her roads to prevent the mails from passing through the State—has the General Government power to make a new road, or to open the ones that have been closed? And, if it has not, a State could not prevent the General Government from exercising its powers. The case put is an extreme one. People would not, by shutting up their roads, be willing to deprive themselves of their advantages. It is not, however, the only instance in which the States can affect the General Government in the exercise of its powers. Sir, a majority of the States containing a minority of the people can put an end to this Government by not appointing Senators. This Government must depend upon public opinion for its support; and whenever public opinion is against it, and it loses the confidence of the people, it must fall—it can no longer exist. This must be the case with all governments like ours. There is no complaint that any road is wanted for the purpose of transmitting the mail; that there is any place of importance wanting a mail that has no road by which it can be carried to it. Where, then, is the necessity of exercising this power? Shall we, sir, make a road to carry the mail upon when it is not wanted, and then convert it into commercial or other purposes? Under a power we do an act, not necessary to carry into execution that power, but to effect another object.

Some say we have the power to make roads and canals, by implication from the power “to regulate commerce among the several States.” From a power to prescribe rules under which commerce shall be conducted among the several States, (for, regulate means prescribe rules,) they contend we have the power to make channels of communication by which commerce can be carried on. To this I shall only say that, in this mode of construction, the Constitution may be made to have as many meanings as the ingenuity of gentlemen can give it, and as various as their different imaginations.

From the power "to raise and support armies," the power to make roads and canals is obtained. It is said, that in this extensive country, covering a vast surface, that, for the proper defence of the country, we ought to have means of giving facility and celerity to the movement of troops and to the transportation of the provisions for their use. That troops ought, with facility, to be moved to any point where they are wanted. That canals and roads would effect this object, and the conclusion is, that we have the power to make canals and roads. This is reasoning from the expediency of a measure to show its constitutionality. This might be the proper course, if this Government had its existence immediately from the people, to show its powers and the propriety of using them. But I should conceive, in this federative Government, it ought first to be shown we have the power to act; then, by showing the expediency of the measure, the propriety and reason for acting would be shown. We must, in acting, be within the scope of our powers; we must act according to the letter of our authority. By the Constitution we have the powers expressly delegated in that instrument, and those "necessary and proper" to carry into effect those delegated by express grants—no others. I would here observe, that, in the grant of sovereign powers by a sovereign, there ought to be a very strong implication to support the implied grant of a power; for, a sovereign cannot be supposed willing to diminish its powers and authority, especially by slight implication. To suppose this, is to suppose a sovereign willing to destroy itself, to commit a political suicide. There are roads in every direction of our country, made in every part of it, and they must necessarily exist as long as there are people in the country. These roads afford facilities for the conveyance of our troops from and to every part of the Union. The making of roads and canals is not, therefore, necessary for the movement of troops and the transportation of provisions, but only to increase the facilities. In saying what powers are given under the clause "necessary and proper to carry into effect" delegated powers, I would not require an absolute necessity, but I would certainly require a direct, and not a remote, relation. It should be a mean obviously suggested to the mind, as necessary and proper to carry into execution the power contemplated, having a direct and proper relation to it. I refer gentlemen to that excellent report of Mr. Madison's, on the Alien and Sedition laws, a part of which has been read by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. RIVES.) If we depart from the mode I have mentioned, and bring in expediency, as a means of interpreting and construing the Constitution, we make it every thing—we can derive from it authority to do any act we wish. It ceases to have that steadfast character which was intended to be given it. It ceases to be the guard of the people's and the States' rights, the landmark bounding the powers of the General Government, and those of the States. It swallows up every power. We should be careful in extending the powers of this Government, and curtailing those of the States. In most of the States, the rights of individuals are secured by a bill of rights—but, in this Government, there is nothing of the kind—nothing pointing out the rights of the citizen, and securing them from infringement by the Government, because it is federative in its character. The State Governments arise immediately from the people, and act directly upon them. In the construction contended for by the advocates of this bill, this Government may, at some future period, to carry into effect some granted power, undertake to regulate descents and the distribution of personal property; and, it appears to me, with as much propriety and right, as it can exercise the power now claimed. I would request gentlemen to pause—and, if they are not clearly convinced, beyond a doubt, they ought not to act. If they have the least doubt, they ought not to vote for this bill.

I promised not to occupy the attention of the Committee long. I have thus briefly given my opinions, and performed my promise.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. TRIMBLE suggested that, as the House was very thin, and some members absent, who probably desired to speak on the subject, it would be proper to have time allowed for a call of the House, before the subject was finally acted upon.

A motion being made that the Committee rise—

The CHAIRMAN decided it to be out of order, the hour prescribed by a rule of the House having not arrived.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, disclaiming all wish on this, or any other occasion, to take advantage of a thin House to obtain a vote—more especially as such vote, if now obtained, would not be final on the bill, expressed a wish that, by general consent, the Committee would rise.

Before the question was taken—

Mr. A. SMYTH rose, and commenced a course of remarks in opposition to the bill, which he continued till four o'clock, when he gave way for a motion for rising.

The Committee rose, accordingly, and, having reported progress, obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 6.

Mr. FORWARD, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which was referred sundry memorials upon the subject, reported a bill laying a duty on sales of merchandise at auction, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. F. JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made a report on the petition of Elliot Rucker, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House tomorrow.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. ABBOT offered the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, viz:

"That no part of the Constitution of the United States ought to be construed, or shall be construed, to authorize the importation or ingress of any person of color into any one of the United States, contrary to the laws of such State."

The resolution was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

On motion of Mr. J. S. BARBOUR, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to George Brooke, of Culpeper county, in the State of Virginia, for certain buildings destroyed by the enemy during the late war, in consequence of their occupation as a place of military depot by the militia of Virginia, when in the service of the United States.

Mr. COCKE laid the following resolution on the table for consideration on to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House a copy of the report of the register of the land office in the eastern district of the State of Louisiana, bearing date the 6th day of January, 1821, together with all information from said register to the Treasury Department, touching said report; more especially copies of all information relative to any lands entered in the name of R. Martin, or his assignee; also a copy of the Secretary of the Treasury's communication laying said report before Congress.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, giving a detail of the measures adopted by them subsequent to their report of the 6th of February, 1823; which report was laid on the table.

The Message received yesterday from the President of the United States, in relation to spoliations committed on the commerce of the United States, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for obtaining the necessary plans, estimates, &c., on roads and canals.

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, resumed, and concluded the argument he commenced yesterday in opposition to the bill. His speech follows entire.

Mr. A. SMYTH having taken the floor, said, he deemed the question one of great importance, as it went to fix the meaning of the Constitution. Nothing, said he, tends more to the security of liberty, than the certainty of the laws; and, of all laws, the most important are the fundamental laws of a nation; which should, therefore, be fixed and certain. This is the great advantage resulting to a nation from having a written constitution. A constitution is a law to those who govern. If its meaning is unsettled and uncertain, it is defective and useless. They who have no certain law, are in the same situation as if they had no law; and they who govern, and are bound by no law, are despots.

Let us inquire, said Mr. S., whether there are any precedents which ought to weigh with us in deciding this question. At the session of 1816, 1817, a bill passed both Houses, assuming, to a certain extent, jurisdiction to make internal improvements—perhaps, by the consent of the States; it passed at a late period of the session, without a full and deliberate discussion; and was presented to the President, Madison, so late that he had not half an hour to devote to its consideration. He rejected it, on the ground that Congress did not possess the power assumed. The passage of this bill, by both Houses of Congress, under such circumstances, forms no precedent worthy of regard. At the next session of Congress, this question was debated during eight days, and the honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) was among those who, with great ability, maintained the power of Congress to make internal improvements, when resolutions, declaring that Congress has power to construct post roads and military roads, and to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States, and to construct canals for military purposes, were severally rejected; and it was thus decided, by the House of Representatives, that Congress have not power to make internal improvements. This decision, as it was against the assumption of this power by Congress, ought to have been allowed to stand, as fixing the meaning of the Constitution, in this respect. But, in the session of 1821–2, a bill passed both Houses, on very little debate, authorizing the setting up of turnpike gates on the Cumberland road; it was rejected by the President, as assuming powers which Congress did not possess, and returned with his objections; and, after maturely considering those objections, this House, by a majority of 72 to 68, rejected the bill.

The honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has spoken of a difference of opinion which, he says, has existed between Congress and the President, as to the extent of powers conferred upon this Government by the Constitution. But no such difference of opinion has existed between the President and the House of Representatives, since the accession of the present Chief Magistrate. The refusal of the House, in 1822, to strike out the enacting clause of the bill for setting up gates on the Cumberland road, or even the passage of the bill, is not such an evidence of the opinion of the House as the final vote, on hearing and weighing the objections of the President. Thus, the weight of precedents seems to be in favor of those who oppose this bill.

Are there any opinions which, in deciding this question, we ought to respect? We have seen that two Presidents, Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, have each of them put his veto on a bill assuming power, in this Government, to make internal improvements. Those gentlemen were, each of them, members of the General Convention who, in 1787, formed the Constitution, and of that Convention in Virginia, in 1788, who adopted it. They knew the intention of those who formed the Constitution, and those who adopted it. In construing any instrument, it ought to be understood as those who entered into it understood it. No gentleman, deciding judicially on a contract, would interpret it any otherwise. With the most perfect knowledge of what the framers of the Constitution intended, Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe have officially declared, that the powers now claimed for Congress were not granted. The opinions of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Gallatin* have been declared to the same effect. If any names should be of authority sufficient to decide this question, these are.

By the construction of the Constitution now contended for by our opponents, all the specifications contained therein are useless. The power to declare war, alone, would, according to their mode of construing the instrument, carry after it all the other granted powers, and every other power that Congress should think fit to exercise. For every power, the exercise of which should have a tendency to make a nation powerful, might be claimed as facilitating, and therefore incidental to the power of making war. This construction would give to the General Government every power, except such as are expressly prohibited. It assumes that the incidental powers which this Government may exercise are not those included in the granted powers; but that they are all such as will, in any way, facilitate the exercise of the granted powers. Then Congress may regulate descents and marriages, with a view to make the nation powerful, as incidental to the power to declare war. This mode of construing the Constitution is the same by which the alien and sedition acts were justified; and it would equally justify any usurpation which a majority might determine upon. Let us hear the arguments by which, in 1799, the alien and sedition acts were justified. In a report then made to the House of Representatives, we find that the supporters of those measures said, that "The right of removing aliens, as 'an incident to the power of war and peace, according to the theory of the Constitution, belongs 'to the Government of the United States;' and that, 'to remove from the country, in times of 'hostility, dangerous aliens who may be employed 'in preparing the way for invasion, is a measure 'necessary for preventing invasion, and of course 'a measure that Congress is empowered to adopt.'" And, with regard to the sedition act, they said that "a law to punish false, scandalous, and malicious writings against the Government, with 'intent to stir up sedition, is a law necessary for 'carrying into effect the power vested by the 'Constitution in the Government of the United 'States, and in the Departments and officers 'thereof, and consequently such a law as Congress may pass." Such were some of the arguments used to justify those unauthorized and tyrannical acts. The main question is the same now as in 1798—the exercise of implied powers not included in the granted powers. The people decided that those acts were unconstitutional, as well as inexpedient, and made an entire change in the administration of the Government, on the ground that the Constitution had been violated. The exercise of this incidental power, then, went to abridge personal liberty, and the people felt it. The exercise of incidental power, now proposed, invades the authority of the States; the State governments will feel it; and their opposition is as much to be avoided as the opposition of the people. The pretence then was, that the safety of the nation required those measures; the pretence now is, that the prosperity of the nation requires the measure proposed. But the nation was then safe without the alien and sedition acts; and the nation will now prosper without the passage of this bill.

Sir, there will arise in every nation, whose Government is not entirely despotic, two parties; the one in favor of extending, the other for abridging or limiting the powers of the Government. There will be found individuals of every shade of opinion, from those who favor anarchy to those who favor despotism. But a question relative to the extent of power has only two sides, on one or other of which all must arrange themselves; and it must be admitted that, on this occasion, we advocate the cause of freedom, while our opponents advocate the extension of power.

What powers did the people intend to grant to this Government? It has been said that this is a National, and not a Federal Government; but it is obviously a Federal Government in all its branches. This Government rests on the State governments; and their preservation alone shows this Government to be Federal. [Here Mr. S. read from the Constitution. "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States.—When vacancies happen in the representation from any State."] But the question is, what are the granted powers? And it makes no difference in the extent of those powers that the representatives of the States in this branch are chosen by the people. I would ask whether an amendment of the Confederation, providing that the representation from each State should be chosen by the people, would have enlarged the powers of the old Congress? I contend that it would not; nor would that Government have ceased to be a Federal Government.

The Constitution was designed to form a Government with special granted powers, and relating, generally, to external objects. [Here Mr. S. read from General WASHINGTON's letter accompanying the Constitution the following clauses: "The friends of our country have long seen and desired that the power of making war, peace, and treaties, that of levying money and regulating commerce, and the corresponding Executive and judicial authorities, should be fully and effectually vested in the General Government of the Union.—Individuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest." The States gave up a share of their power, but reserved the residue. "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States." Between this Government and a consolidated Government, or that of a State, there is this difference—a State government possesses all legislative power (limited by reason only) which is not expressly withheld by the Constitution or Bill of Rights; but this Government possesses only the powers expressly granted to it by the States. This was the true construction of the Constitution before the adoption of the tenth amendment, which declares that the "powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people." You possess certain granted powers, and power to pass laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution those powers. But you claim incidental powers. If they are included in the granted powers, they pass; but, if they are not included, they do not pass. If the power claimed as incidental is a part performance, a part exercise of the granted power, it is included in the granted power, and given. Thus, by the power to raise and support armies, you may determine on the number and kind of troops, direct enlistments, prescribe an oath, make a violation of it perjury, punish desertion or seduction, and so on; that is, whatever is a part performance of the power, you may do; but you cannot exercise ungranted powers, because they would facilitate the execution of the granted power.

* It is evident that the United States cannot, under the Constitution, open any road or canal, without the consent of the States through which such road or canal must pass."—Gallatin's Report.

It is important to understand what powers the Convention deemed distinct. They have considered a power to lay and collect taxes as distinct from power to raise and support armies; and that power as distinct from power to provide and maintain a navy. They considered powers to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, to coin money, and fix the standard of weights and measures, as distinct from power to regulate commerce. It is not sufficient that the power which you claim as incidental is a kindred power, it must be an included power; for, if it is distinct, it does not pass. Is it seriously contended that, by the power to declare war, the powers to lay and collect taxes, raise armies, and provide navies, would pass? The Confederation had power to declare war, but no power to lay and collect taxes. Declaring war only changes the situation of the country; the war, when declared, must be carried on by those who have powers for that purpose. You are the agents of the States; your powers are to be construed strictly; you are not to despoil the State governments of authority which the States have not granted to you.

I will proceed to consider that part of the argument of the friends of the bill which claims for Congress the power to make roads, in virtue of the grant of power "to establish post offices and post roads." When a special power is granted, a more general power, which would have included the special power, is not granted. Powers not granted are retained; and the special power being granted, the general is retained. Here power to establish post roads is granted, this excludes you from claiming authority to establish any roads except post roads; for your power is special—to establish post roads only. This being a particular kind of internal improvement, it would seem that it was not intended you should have any thing to do with roads of other kinds, or with canals.* As your power is only to establish post roads, you have nothing to do with the construction, even, of post roads, unless it can be shown that to establish means to construct. If that is done, you will have power to construct post roads, but no claim to power to construct either military or commercial roads.

The word establish, like most other words, has various significations, according to the subject-matter in relation to which it is used. According to the best authority, establish signifies to settle firmly, to fix unalterably; to settle in any privilege or possession, to confirm; to make firm, to ratify; to fix or settle an opinion; to form or model; to found, to build firmly, to fix irrevocably—(a sense not in use); to make a settlement of any inheritance—(a sense not in use.) But the example given in support of the signification, to form or model, is, "he appointed in what manner his family should be established," which shows that it is not a forming or modelling by the hands that was meant. Let a hundred modern volumes be examined, it will be found that to establish uniformly means a determination of the will, and not an operation by hands. Words should be understood in the sense intended by those who used them. In what sense have the Convention used this word? We find in the Constitution, "establish justice"—"establish this Constitution"—"establish a uniform rule"—"establish courts"—"the establishment of this Constitution"—"an establishment of religion." The Convention have uniformly used this word as signifying an authoritative decision of the will; and when we say a thing is established, we usually mean by decree, judgment, or order of those having authority, or by an act of legislation—as to establish a title; to establish a will; to establish headquarters; to establish a court. When we say a road is established, do we mean by the overseer who makes it? No; we mean by the court which has decided where it shall be. The Confederation conferred the power "of establishing and regulating post offices from one State to another." The change in the wording of the clause in the Constitution seems to have been made to correct a solecism, and not to confer any additional authority. Was it ever understood that the Confederation had, by this clause, jurisdiction over the territory, and might take the soil and build a post office? I presume not. They might purchase a house for a post office, and hold it, under the laws of a State, as an individual might hold property. To establish a post office is to create an office with certain prescribed duties, which office is to be filled by the appointment of an officer to perform those duties. To establish a post road is to give a road a legal designation as a post road. Wherever the word is used in the Constitution, it means, to give legal existence.

Let us see what was the contemporaneous construction of this clause of the Constitution by those who formed, adopted, and commenced proceedings under it. They were well inclined to exercise all their Constitutional powers. They understood that Congress were to adopt and use the roads of the States. This was the construction put on this grant of power by the generation who adopted the Constitution.

Sir, I propose to you a safe rule for construing the Constitution in time to come, which is this: Whatever was done and acquiesced in during an age—say thirty years from the adoption of the Constitution—let that be considered as Constitutional; but whatever was not done or not acquiesced in as Constitutional in that age, let it be held to be unconstitutional.

Those who formed, adopted, and acted under the Constitution, heretofore, have put a meaning on this clause which it is now too late to change. If we confine ourselves to the powers which have been exercised by our predecessors, and acquiesced in, there is no danger to the rights of the States or the people; but if we at this day claim and exercise new powers, we set a pernicious example to those who shall succeed us.

It will be well to consider the burden which you take upon yourselves, if you decide that to establish means to construct. You will undertake to construct all the post roads in the country. You have constructed one hundred and twenty miles of post road, but you established eighty-eight thousand miles of post road. You cannot decide that establish means construct, as to one hundred and twenty miles of road, but that it does not mean construct, as to the remaining eighty-eight thousand miles of post road. So, if establish signifies construct, you have passed laws for the construction of eighty-eight thousand miles of post road, and should cause it to be done without delay. Will not the States say that you have assumed the jurisdiction, and taken upon you the duty of keeping these roads in repair? Will they not withdraw from these roads the superintendents and laborers of the States, and the protection of the State laws? It may be expected; for, if the jurisdiction and the duty is properly assumed by you, it no longer remains with them, and your acts are the supreme law of the land.

You may establish post routes, and so may the States. They are not forbidden the exercise of this privilege, as they are to keep ships and troops in time of peace; and they might deem it expedient to circulate intelligence. Can you seize on all their roads, impose tolls, and exercise other paramount or exclusive jurisdiction? What becomes of the rights of turnpike companies chartered by the States? The States claim and exercise power to alter roads not made by chartered companies, and to discontinue such as are useless. Does a road, as soon as you establish it a post road cease to be under the jurisdiction of the State? Suppose that there is a contest before the State courts, which of two ways shall be established as a public road? Will the passing of your mail boy with his bag along one of them, decide the contest and establish that trace along which he passes? If you assume jurisdiction, the roads can only be altered and repaired under your authority. Leave the jurisdiction to the States, and let them repair and alter the roads at pleasure. The fact that you use eighty-eight thousand miles of roads, made by the States, shows that it is not necessary you should assume this authority. Wherever a mule carrying a bag can go, your mail can go. You fix on certain points, and between these it becomes the duty of the States to have some road. Your acts are the supreme law, and the State courts are bound thereby; but the intermediate trace between the points you designate let the States alter, repair, and control at their pleasure. [When Mr. S. had proceeded thus far in his argument, the Committee rose; on the 6th he continued.]

Having considered the argument of the friends of the bill, founded on the power given to Congress to establish post roads, I will proceed to consider their arguments founded on the power "to regulate commerce among the several States." It has been said that roads and canals will facilitate commerce among the several States, and therefore, as you have the control of commerce, you may construct them. If power to regulate commerce among the States will authorize you to do whatever will facilitate commerce, your power is unlimited. You may take upon you the interior police, and the administration of justice in the States; for, by so doing, you may facilitate commerce. But commerce is to be "regulated," and among the States; and this word "among," signifies between the States. It was so understood at the adoption of the Constitution. Mr. Madison, writing on this subject, says, "The defect of power in the existing Confederacy, to regulate the commerce between its several members, is in the number of those which 'have been clearly pointed out by experience.'" The power given to Congress is the same in relation to commerce between the States, as in relation to commerce between this nation and foreign nations. You may regulate commerce with foreign nations; but this gives you no power to regulate the interior commerce of this nation. You may regulate the commerce of one State with another State; but, this gives you no power to regulate the internal commerce of either. You may establish ports, license vessels, impose tonnage and other duties in the one case, and so you may in the other.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) says, "The power given to Congress is a power which a State did not possess. I agree with him, that the power is such as a State did not possess.

A State could not, alone, regulate commerce between it and another State. This is the power granted to Congress which a State did not possess. But a State did possess power to regulate commerce in its own interior, and this power has not been granted to Congress. The Speaker (Mr. CLAY) has argued that unless the power to regulate commerce among the States implies authority to foster, promote, and facilitate it, the clause is without a meaning; for, that Congress has no power to lay imposts and duties on the trade among the several States. The gentleman is mistaken. This Government may lay duties on articles imported from another State. The principal object of granting this power to Congress was, to take from the States authority over the subject, which had been exercised to their mutual injury. The friends of the bill understand "regulate commerce," to mean "facilitate the carriage of goods." Is this a fair construction? Roads and canals are means of carrying on commerce; but, are you to furnish the means of carrying on commerce—the ships, the carriages, the capital? It is for you to regulate commerce, to prescribe the manner in which it shall be carried on, not to provide the means.

Power is given to Congress to regulate commerce among the States, which otherwise must have been regulated by compacts or treaties between them, but such a power extends not to regulate commerce between different places in the same State. Can it be believed that by this clause power was intended to be given to Congress to execute a system of internal improvement? If it had been intended to grant such a power, would it not have been explicitly and effectually granted? Such a construction as is contended for, never entered into the minds of the Convention; and it is contrary to good faith to give to the language they have used, a meaning entirely different from that with which they used it. But, suppose that by "regulate commerce," you understand "make internal improvements," you will be restricted to such as are between the States; and what will this authorize you to do? Why, to make a bridge across the Potomac, the Delaware, or the Ohio, between the States. The power granted to Congress to regulate commerce among the States, is an exclusive power; it is clearly an exclusive power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and with the Indian tribes; and it cannot be contended that the same word, in the same sentence, has several meanings. Whatever power may be exercised under this grant, you may exercise exclusively. If, by this power, you may interfere with the internal commerce of a State, you have exclusive jurisdiction over the whole commerce of the country, not only between the States, but between county and county, village and village, man and man. And what is this commerce, of which you have exclusive jurisdiction? Why, every sale of property that is made in the country may be considered as commerce, and under your regulation. What authority will be left to the States? Will not this be consolidation?

It is contended that you may make roads and canals by your power to make war. Does authority to direct the force of confederated States carry with it the interior police of the confederated States? Does the Emperor of Germany, by his power to direct the force of the Empire, make internal improvements in Saxony and Wirtemberg? I have never understood so. Did Napoleon, as head of the Confederation of the Rhine, claim such a power? No; he expressly disclaimed the good that the German Princes should effect in their respective States. The old Congress had power to make war, but never claimed, as incident, power to make roads and canals. Our experience in two wars has proved that this power is not necessary to the General Government. It is not a means of defence. It suited conquering Rome to have military roads leading to all her frontiers; but it is no advantage to an invaded nation. The same roads on which Bonaparte marched his armies to invade Germany, led the Russians and Germans to Paris. I cannot agree with the honorable Speaker (Mr. CLAY) that the General Government possesses no power in war that it does not possess in peace. Many things may be lawfully done in the prosecution of war, that would be altogether unlawful in time of peace. In war, every thing is lawful that is indispensable for the safety of the nation. "The safety of the people is the supremelaw." During the war of the Revolution, Norfolk was burned by our own force. Would that have been lawful in time of peace? Did not General WASHINGTON propose to burn New York, that it might not afford Winter quarters to the enemy? Yes; and he would have burned it, had not Congress decided otherwise. We have seen the Emperor of Russia burn his capital, that it might not afford Winter quarters to an enemy. But I cannot agree that, in time of peace, the General Government may do every thing that it may do in prosecuting war. I have no doubt that, in prosecuting war, the President might order the public force to make a road or a canal wherever he found it necessary; but the measure would be temporary, and no jurisdiction would be assumed. The preparations for war, which you may make in peace, are prescribed by the Constitution. Your power is to make war, not to govern the highways. We have been told of precedents; we have directed the making of a road in Arkansas. In that territory, we yet hold the empire, the high domain, and do not violate the jurisdiction of any State. But are the roads and canals, which you would make, really intended for military purposes? No; they are intended for travelling and commercial purposes; and it is a pretence to say that you will make them by your power to declare and prosecute war.

It is contended that, by the power to lay and collect taxes, to provide for the common defence and general welfare, we have power to appropriate money to make roads and canals. I cannot agree that we may thus appropriate the public money. We hold it in trust, to be used in carrying into execution our Constitutional powers; and for no other purpose. The common defence and general welfare are to be provided for by the execution of the granted powers. The power to raise money is unlimited; but the power of appropriation is limited; and if at any time more money is raised than the execution of your Constitutional powers requires, it must remain unexpended until it is wanted to aid in the execution of some Constitutional power. The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) while he admits that the words, "to provide for the common defence and general welfare," were intended as a limitation of the power to lay taxes, contends that the terms used are so general that there is no limitation. Be it so. Strike out this intended limitation. You have then an unlimited power to raise revenue. But the money of the people can only be drawn from the Treasury by law, and all laws must be pursuant to the Constitution. You have power to pass all laws necessary and proper for the execution of the granted powers; but an act which shall appropriate money to the execution of a power not granted, would be a violation of the Constitution. It seems to me, that a claim of power to raise money to any amount, and to expend it on any object that Congress might choose to select, to which the Constitutional powers of this Government do not extend, is most unreasonable.

I admit that money may be necessary, and lawfully expended, in many cases where you assume no jurisdiction over the territory. You may procure ship timber for the Navy, but you cannot assume jurisdiction over the country where it grows, and pass forest laws. Money may be expended for carrying the mail, without assuming jurisdiction to make the roads along which it is to pass. It is said that we have established a military academy, built sea-walls and lighthouses, set up beacons and buoys, and we are required to show by what granted powers we have made the appropriations. You have power to raise armies—officers are necessary; and this power may justify your appropriations for the military academy. You have power to maintain a navy; to maintain, is to preserve; and this power will justify your appropriations for sea-walls, lighthouses, beacons, and buoys. But you have made the Cumberland road. True; you did so in performing a lawful compact. You had power to dispose of the territory of the United States; this implied a right to fix the terms. You had power to make regulations respecting the public property. These powers authorized your compact, and consequent appropriations. A gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEWART) said that you had passed penal laws, and made quarantine regulations. You have power to legislate; and penal laws are the necessary sanction of legislation. Quarantine regulations are authorized by power to regulate commerce. A gentleman from New York (Mr. STORRS) said that by your power to coin money, you had purchased a house in Philadelphia. A house was necessary; but you assume no jurisdiction. You hold your house under, and protected by, the laws of Pennsylvania. But if you make internal improvements, you assume jurisdiction, and the domain.

The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) informs us that the President, Madison, recommended the establishment of a national university. If the gentleman deems the opinion of Mr. Madison authority, why does he not respect his veto put on a bill for making internal improvements? But the recommendation of Mr. Madison was to establish a university in this District, where you have exclusive jurisdiction. You have since actually established a college, but without making any appropriation. If Mr. Madison intended that the university should be endowed, he might intend that it should be done by the power to dispose of the public lots; as schools are provided for in the Western country. The gentleman speaks of the monuments erected to distinguished men. Another gentleman (Mr. STEWART) has spoken of pensions. The appropriations for both of these may be regarded as the payment of a debt. "The asylums," says Vattel, "prepared for soldiers and reduced officers, who are grown old in the service, or whom fatigue or the enemy have rendered incapable of providing subsistence for themselves, may be considered as a part of the military pay." The splendid structure, and the ample provision, made in favor of invalids, both in France and England, do honor to the sovereign and the nation, which thus liberally discharge a sacred debt." The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. McDUFFIE) spoke of the appropriation of fifteen millions for the purchase of Louisiana. That appropriation was authorized by the Constitution. We have authority to pass laws necessary to carry into execution the powers vested in any department or officer of the Government. The President, with the advice of the Senate, has power to make treaties; and we have power (I speak not of obligation) to pass appropriation laws to carry them into execution. If the gentleman will show a power to make internal improvements, as clearly as I have shown the power to appropriate money to carry a treaty into effect, there will be an end of the controversy.

A powerful appeal to our sympathies has been made by the honorable Speaker, (Mr. CLAY,) on behalf of the people of the West. If this is to be a general measure, not partial to any portion of the community, I see no reason why a particular appeal should be made to us on behalf of the West. Does the gentleman mean that whenever a fort shall be built in Boston, or elsewhere, on the seaboard, that a like sum must be expended on roads and canals in the West? The gentleman says that if we omit to make internal improvements, he believes the Union will be shaken to its centre. But why does the gentleman complain on behalf of the West—"the poor West?" What is there to afflict the intelligent and enterprising people of the West? Have they not the finest country under Heaven on which to exercise their industry? Do not the people of Kentucky possess ten thousand square miles of land superior to the best one thousand acres that ever was found in Palestine? They pay no taxes to this Government except what they voluntarily pay as consumers; and there has been no limit to the liberality of this Government to the Western people. So long as civilization remains in the Western country, and the titles to lands are traced to this Government, an imperishable monument of its liberality will remain in the donations for the use of schools. Not less than twenty thousand square miles have been allotted to this purpose in eight new States and Territories. Twelve millions eight hundred thousand acres of land, worth sixteen millions of dollars! This is a durable evidence of the kindness of this Government to the people of the West. You have made the Cumberland road, for the Western people only, at an expense of near two millions of dollars; you have made various other roads in the Western country; you have given more than seventy thousand acres of land to make a road in Ohio. The people of the West have only had to ask and have; when they had embarrassed themselves by purchases of lands, they were released from the contracts as far as they desired, and further time given to pay what remained due. Why, then, do the citizens of the West complain? The gentleman says that Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, are now the chief emigrating States; it is their citizens who purchase the lands of the United States—an evidence of their prosperity. One million and a half paid annually, for Western lands, will not impoverish the Western people, if they receive annually a greater sum. By a paper before me, it appears that three thousand ninety-one horses and mules, forty-four thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight hogs, and a number of beef cattle, the whole estimated at upwards of $700,000, have passed the ford of Cumberland river, from Kentucky; and it is supposed that stock, to a like amount in value, has left the State by other routes. Here, then, is the million and a half received by a single State for live stock only. What must be the amount received by all the Western States, when, to the price of their stock, is added that of their hemp, their flour, their bacon, and other produce? The live stock here enumerated, has left Kentucky by a road leading through my district, on which no public moneys have been expended, but which has been made and repaired by the labor of the people.

Sir, I cannot agree with the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) that there is any danger that the Union will be shaken by the discontent of the people of the West. The time has been, when a Carondelet, and a Wilkinson, a Burr, and a Blannerhassett, could disturb the tranquility of the West; but that time has gone by. The gentleman (Mr. C.) said that the Cumberland road had not yet gone into any Western State. It has gone as far as is necessary; and yet it is a road for the people of the West. It has gone to the Ohio river, the great Western highway, by which you may pass to any of the Western States. A gentleman from Pennsylvania told us of a great advantage arising to the Government from the Cumberland road; we get the mail carried thirty dollars a mile cheaper than formerly; but this road, one hundred and twenty miles in length, cost us near two millions of dollars, the interest of which is near one hundred and twenty thousand dollars, or near one thousand dollars per mile; thus, you lose, annually, one thousand dollars per mile, the interest of your money, besides the cost of repairs—and you save thirty dollars a mile in the expense of carrying the mail! Such is the economy recommended by the gentleman.

I have heard it said that the lands set apart for the use of schools, were not given by the Government; that they were paid for by those who purchased the adjacent lands. This I do not admit. I much doubt whether the purchasers of the Western lands would give a shilling more for a quarter section, in consequence of your donations for schools. If you were about to sell a farm of three hundred and sixty acres of land, do you think that you would improve the price by previously laying off ten acres of it, and conveying those ten acres for the use of a school? I should expect you to make a proportional reduction in the price of your tract of land.

The navigation of the Mississippi may be improved, without assuming power to make internal improvements within a State, and thus encroaching on State jurisdiction. That river is nowhere the property of a State; it forms a boundary to States, except in Louisiana; and there you have reserved the navigation. By your power to provide and maintain a navy, you have only to build a gunboat at Louisville, and, in your descent to the ocean, clear the Mississippi of every snag and sawyer that obstructs the navigation.

Roads and canals are said to produce beneficial effects. Well; the States have reserved the power to make them. Shall we not leave to the States the power to do good, which they have reserved to themselves? Shall we arrogate to ourselves all power to do good? Shall we manage the agriculture of the country, the fisheries, and the commerce? The gentleman from South Carolina talks of the necessity of convenient ways of communication between the East and West. They are made already. The New York canal has opened the communications between all the States north of the Ohio river and the east. Pennsylvania has connected the Ohio and the Delaware, by excellent turnpike roads. You have made the Cumberland road; and while you are debating, the Legislature of Virginia have passed a bill incorporating a company to connect the Ohio with the Chesapeake. That State has also nearly completed the communication between the Ohio and James river. So the argument of the gentleman, in favor of the ways of communication between the East and West, comes too late.

The scheme is deceptive. While you appear to confer benefits on the States, you do but take their money with one hand, and give it back to them with the other. I should like to know how much of the appropriation proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. STEWART,) would come to the share of Illinois or Mississippi. Would it enable one of those States to make half a mile of turnpike road annually? I presume it would not, at the Cumberland rates. You will give New York a share, but you will decide where it shall be expended; and you may make a canal that, instead of being a benefit, may be an injury to the State. I find, in a newspaper, these remarks respecting the proposed Susquehanna canal: "They 'are all alive in Baltimore, and indeed throughout Maryland, on the subject. Should the Conawago and Baltimore canal be completed, the 'interest of Philadelphia will be seriously injured.'" Let the States beware of the consequences of the power of internal improvement being assumed by this Government—as improvement, in one section of the country, may tend to the injury of another. Virginia, blind to the consequences, has decided hastily to expend her resources in opening the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, although it must rival her great central communication, and divert the Western trade from her own cities. In Baltimore, they understand their own interests better—they oppose the Potomac canal, but patronize the Susquehanna canal, which will enrich Baltimore, while it injures Philadelphia.

Canals are not always profitable. A very unfair statement of the profits of English canals has been made, by keeping out of view the many which are productive of little profit. It has been remarked of the English canals, that none are profitable except those on which coals are carried. But, if canals are profitable, let the States, who have reserved the power to make them, take the profit. If they are not profitable, shall we, while we pay six per cent. for money, invest it in stock which may produce one-half of one per cent. dividend? Is it a pleasing thing to impose taxes on the people—to give their money away? Let the States manage this business. If they shall enrich themselves, they will enrich the nation.

Sir, this is merely a question of power—a question who shall collect a revenue, and possess the power and patronage attending its expenditure. It will soon be found, that ten millions annually will be required; or perhaps 20,000 soldiers may be employed, in making internal improvements. You must greatly increase the number of your officers, for the management and protection of your roads and canals. You must have new courts or justices; and these must be appointed for life, and have fixed and adequate salaries. The exercise of this power will produce discord. One city will ask you to make a canal—another will oppose it; and thus your deliberations will be agitated by the contentions of opposing interests. It is admitted that the powers of this Government are conferred for the general good; but every road or canal must be of local concern. Even the New York canal, the greatest undertaking of the kind that has been or will be undertaken, is only beneficial to a part of the nation. A fortification at Boston, or New Orleans, is for the protection of the nation. Our fleet, wherever built, sails for the nation. You call the Cumberland road a national road, but, unless you mean that it was made with the money of the nation, it no more deserves the name, than the road which leads through my district to the Western States, which has been made by the laboring people.

If you undertake this system of internal improvement, your money will be wasted by improvidence and extravagance. Look to the Cumberland road, which has cost $15,000 per mile—$40,000 apiece for bridges that might have been dispensed with. No money is thus squandered, except the money of the United States. Do you govern this District, wherein you have exclusive jurisdiction, so well, that you ought to assume jurisdiction over the interior police of the States? You have left these people to be governed by the obsolete laws of Maryland and Virginia. You have given them no system of police. You will not be able to arrive at your lodgings, without being assailed by beggars—and yet you will take upon you the whole interior police of the country.

The gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) tells us, his State has expended a million of dollars on internal improvements, to little purpose. That is to be regretted. The money might have been better laid out, had the proper means been taken to procure information. Virginia has succeeded better. A report of the Board of Public Works, which I have before me, says, that, "Whilst the territory of the Commonwealth 'abounds with objects of valuable internal improvement, in every district, the fund appropriated for that purpose is adequate, upon the principles upon which it is founded, to give effectual aid to such improvements, to the full extent of the demand which can probably be made upon it.'" This shows what any State may accomplish. Let the States be convinced of the advantage of roads and canals, and they will make them.

Sir, this Government rests on the affections of the people, and the confidence of the State Legislatures. Whatever has a tendency to alienate that affection, and diminish that confidence, has a tendency to weaken the Union. These States are not held together by the sword. Let gentlemen be cautious how they assume a doubtful, a disputed power, lest they destroy the harmony between this Government and the States. The General and State Governments have been found to be happily balanced. But, an immense increase of the internal power of the General Government will derange the balance.

And, if we had the power, our situation is not favorable to the commencement of this system. We have a large debt to pay, a navy to build, and fortifications to complete. A contest is depending for the rights of man and the independence of nations, into which we may be drawn. Is this a time to engage in schemes which may require ten or fifteen millions annually? Is this a time to seize on powers, as to which there is an honest difference of opinion, many believing that their exercise will be acts of usurpation? No, sir. This is a time to draw strong and plain the landmarks of the Constitution, and thus strengthen mutual confidence. I shall vote in favor of the proposition to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

When Mr. SMYTH had concluded—

Mr. GAZLAY, of Ohio, addressed the Chair as follows: The bill on your table, said Mr. G., contemplates the appropriation of $30,000, for the procurement of estimates and surveys for roads and canals. Against such a bill, requiring so small a sum for what he conceived to be a great national object, he could not have anticipated a single voice; and much less could he have anticipated that, to other objections, would be added unconstitutionality and danger to the Union. As to any danger, Mr. G. said, he would as soon have expected it from the common blessings—rain and sunshine. He called this a great national object, and, if it were not such, and if gentlemen could maintain that it is a local and sectional one, he was ready to vote against it. Commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, are greatly and equally promoted by the improvement of roads and canals. These are the great arteries of the nation, by which its extremes approximate and its wealth is every where diffused. They save labor and equalize the markets—they bring from regions of plenty, in some products, and pour into those of want. They are no less distinguishable in their character than in their effects, from most national works, inasmuch as they produce national wealth, while most others impoverish. All the national defences to which so many millions are devoted, such as ships, fortifications, and the like, in themselves, produce nothing. They impoverish. They are, to the treasure of the nation, much what luxuries are to that of an individual. It is vastly different with roads and canals. It was, Mr. G. said, a new theory, that the munificent and most productive national works were the most dangerous and the last to be undertaken. He believed a great majority of the people entertained opinions quite the opposite from this, and he hoped they would never yield them. Mr. G. said he had hitherto supposed that the principal inducement for giving sovereign power, was the attainment of great national objects, which no individual exertions were likely to attain. He understood that it was general interest and general security which formed the national cement. Take them away, and no civil union can be long maintained. He had supposed that every sovereign power was bound to guard and advance these great objects. But gentlemen in the opposite, Mr. G. said, seemed to think that the Constitution interposed to forbid us the exercise of this sovereign power; and, to prove this, they cite opinions given at the time of its adoption, and since. It was not public opinion, Mr. G. supposed, that was intended; for this, he believed, was ever the creature of circumstance and occasion, and always a correct standard. If correct then, it is now correct; and for the same reason that it was then correct. Public opinion, therefore, could be no evidence against itself. It is private opinion that is most insisted on, and that which is expressed in the Federalist. And, it is said, that; inasmuch as the power to make roads and canals is nowhere expressly allowed, in that book, we have no right to exercise it. The opportunities and situation, as well as the talents and character of the writers, are urged, as giving resistless force to their authority or opinions. It must be remembered that they were but men, and, as our history abundantly proves, writing at a time of great excitement, no doubt with the purest and best of motives; but, yet, as partisans of a favorite measure—great in itself, yet violently opposed—a measure, in the adoption of which, the authors of the Federalist felt an interest deep as the fountain of life itself. It is no reflection on them, to say what was natural and proper—that the strongest features of power, in the instrument, should be lightly touched; while its weaker and less apprehensive ones should be brought out in the most engaging attitudes. The times forbade a fair and full exposition of its powers, in the same degree that the instrument itself forbade it. It is not to be supposed—it is not required of the human mind to judge correctly on any point, until it be presented with the facts and circumstances which attend upon its practice, and those which bear upon it at the time of giving such judgment. And much less can we expect correctness in anticipating political opinions, on principles of government both new to the age and new to the world. In this field we every where meet some unexpected combination or occurrence to mock our best discernment, and to confute our deepest speculations. Practice is the only safe ordeal for political constitutions or opinions. Was it ever foreseen by the writers referred to, that difficulties would attend the designation of the President, the provisions for which are as simple as any in the instrument? The very circumstance that we are this day in ardent debate on the meaning of the ordinary words in our language, used in that instrument, sets at defiance all former opinion of them.

To insist, said Mr. G., that reliance shall be placed on former opinions, in the discussion of a great political question, is to deny to politics what is allowed to every other affair of life. Where will gentlemen turn to avoid the progress which has accompanied every art and science since the adoption of this instrument? Things as absurd as a revolving world once was, are every day established as physical and moral truths. The existence and continuance of our Government itself, Mr. G. said, was a contradiction of the opinions and speculations of the most enlightened of former times. He was not prepared to give up the hope, that the progress of those political combinations on which it is founded, would result in great benefits to the world. He could not yield the right to judge of them as they deserved; and that, for the reason that others had judged before them. Mr. G. said, he thought the safest rule was to try the Constitution by itself, and where it gave power, not to refuse the exercise of it, from vain and imaginary alarm.

The consequences which gentlemen say will grow out of this measure, viz. consolidation of the general and degradation of the State governments, Mr. G. said, must be proved to threaten us, before he should withhold his vote on their account—he came to this House fully sensible of the importance of maintaining State sovereignty, and as well in the general sentiment of this body, as in the spirited opposition of gentlemen who use the argument, he was persuaded that the States had an abundant guarantee of safety. So far from apprehending danger from measures of internal improvement, he should advocate them with a firm conviction, that they would strengthen and support all the separate parts of the Union as separate parts, in the same and perhaps in a greater degree than they would cement and strengthen the whole. Mr. G. said, he thought this too plain to require an argument as to accumulation of power in the arm of the General Government, which is foretold as a part of the argument to show the loss of it by the States. Mr. G. said he had never understood that the power acquired by conferring benefits on the nation was ever dangerous, on account of its increase, or by the frequency of its exercise; he always had believed that the reverse of this was true: and that ours must be the most singular of all Governments, if its war and taxing power were harmless, while the munificent and beneficial ones which it could exercise were dangerous.

Mr. G. said, he should not contend that the right to make roads and canals, is inferred or got by implication; but, that it is expressly given: if it were not expressly given it ought not to be exercised; he could not suppose that in reading our language, whether in the shape of a constitution, a deed, or other instrument, we had any other than the ordinary rules of construction, well known to its framers, as well as to most others; and the rule he understood to be that, to find their meaning, words must be taken in their ordinary acceptation; and if they then give power or allow a thing to be done, it may be done, unless there are other words which limit or restrain such common acceptation, or show how they are to be understood differently; take a familiar example, almost every statute or act of our numerous legislative bodies contains some grant of general power, or right to do some particular thing, which is generally followed with the proviso or negative restraining the extent, to which such power or right might be carried. The same may be said of almost every contract or writing executed daily in the common affairs of life; by this common rule, Mr. G. said he would attempt to try some of the provisions of the Constitution.

The preamble is an important part of the instrument; it contains a recognition of all the legitimate objects of Government, as the basis on which ours was established; to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, &c., as far as language can embrace the powers and objects of Government; they could not be more ample than in this short preamble. That this preamble was not inserted out of mere idleness, he found sufficient evidence in the details of the instrument in which the same words were employed: example, eighth section of the first article treating of the powers of Congress, it declares the taxing and debt paying power; and then, that to provide for the common defence and general welfare, in the very words of the preamble; if these words mean any thing less than they express, viz: to provide for the common defence and general welfare, Mr. G. said he wished to know what they did mean—he would not attempt to answer the verbal criticism of gentlemen, used respecting them, but would submit to the common sense of every reader of the language. He conceived, that, if they had any meaning, it is, that Congress may provide for the common welfare, in relation to every subject, matter, or thing, with which they are intrusted, and in which they are not restrained by some other provision in the Constitution, and if they are restrained in the mode or manner as to any particular in part, then to all relating to the same in which they are not restrained. Now, the principal objects with which Congress are intrusted, are those of war, commerce, and revenue; all that is needful to promote those great objects, or required, as a provision for the welfare of them, the Congress may do; and where is the danger? What are the evils to result from this power? Those certainly, and no others, which may flow and result from the sovereign power of any Government; and if danger were a good argument in this, it is good against forming any Government or giving any power, and the only difference between the characters of the same powers given to ours, or to a king, or emperor, is in the organ who executes or carries into effect. Ours is perfectly safe, because it is executed by the immediate servants of the people, recalled at pleasure, to return to private life, and to sustain the weight of their own bad measures, if they adopt any. The other is executed without responsibility or control. Ours may be said to be the act of the people themselves in relation to themselves; the other, the acts of a superior in power in relation to the maintenance of that power. The one is perfectly safe, while the other may be highly oppressive. It is true, said Mr. G., that the exercise of this power involves a great degree of discretion, and so do all and every power given either to Congress or any other department involve the same degree. It is the misfortune, if misfortune it may be called, of our nature and the subject, which compel us, after all, to submit almost every thing to discretion.

The next inquiry is, said Mr. G., whether roads and canals can, on any view of the power, be considered as necessary to the common welfare or general safety in relation to the objects enumerated; and, if they are, Congress, for aught he could see, have the same power to construct them that they have to meet in the Capitol.

Why is a road or a canal necessary to the welfare of war, commerce, or revenue? Instead of answering a question which must be plain to every capacity, it may be asked why are they not just as much so as a ship, a fort, a lighthouse, or a national dock, a gun, or an armory? And, as there is no express power given to build or make these, why are so many millions appropriated for them? It may be answered that the general power of war and commerce include necessarily the power to do all and every act or thing, to provide for their welfare; and this is the true answer. And, can it be true, that a lighthouse is necessary for war and commerce, a fort or dock is necessary for the same, and that a road or canal is not—in other words, that war and commerce relate to the sea only? Here Congress have omnipotent power. They may appropriate millions of treasure, and enrich the sea and the seaboard, and its inhabitants; but to the land, the interior, and to its inhabitants, they can give nothing; they have no power. Can such an argument be maintained for a single moment? The Constitution says, “provide a navy,” not build a navy. It does not say any thing of either providing or building docks, forts, or armories. It is true, the power to build these may possibly be inferred from the clause giving jurisdiction over them, in certain cases. But then this is an inferred power only, and gentlemen are opposed to all inferred power; and, Mr. G. said, he was equally opposed to it. The next clause in the Constitution which bore direct relation to the clause already insisted on, is that which gives to Congress the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the other powers, &c. This, if there could be a doubt as to what it was intended Congress might do, must effectually remove it. There is no less than three different places in the instrument where these general powers to accomplish the objects of the Government are expressly recognised and given. Mr. G. said, both as to expression and intention, he felt fully authorized to assert the power contemplated in the bill. But, it is not from these general provisions alone, Mr. G. said, that he drew the power to make roads and canals, but from others less general. The words “to establish post offices and post roads,” and to “regulate commerce,” Mr. G. said, were to his mind a conclusive gift of the purposes of the bill; and, on these clauses, gentlemen in the opposition had indulged in a verbal criticism, the extent of which he did not feel himself at liberty to follow. It was contended that “establish” means to point out and designate only; and that “regulate commerce” implies foreign commerce only, or exterior commerce. The greatest difficulty, Mr. G. said, into which gentlemen had fallen, was, that they appropriated a meaning to the words which was never before given to them; and he was not sensible of any greater evil that could befall the Constitution than to subject it to the rule of construction contended for. One gentleman gives this meaning, and another that meaning, to a word, each to suit his own views; but what becomes of the instrument? Why, it must remain without meaning. And this will happen to almost every clause of it; for every important word has several distinct meanings. Take that to “establish;” it has four meanings, one of which is to build. Now, which shall be adopted as the Constitutional meaning? Who is to decide this important desideratum, which, Mr. G. said, he was quite sure the makers never dreamed of? Mr. G. said he supposed that there was a safe, plain rule, and that was to give to every word all its meanings, which would not do violence to the context of this instrument. He could see no other rule; and, with this rule, the Congress have the power already contended for by the supporters of this bill. But, gentlemen say, if the framers of the Constitution intended that Congress should have the power, they would have inserted the very word “make;” and, not having done so, is evidence that the power was not intended to be given. This, Mr. G. said, was nothing more than a dispute about the choice of words.

But, if it were a good objection to one clause of the instrument, it must be good against all where the favorite words are not used. Let us see how this will end, by citing a few passages: “Each house may determine the rules of its proceedings.” This is a very important power, and the word determine, in its strict sense, contemplates something in existence, on which to determine. Yet no one doubts that it gives the power to “make,” although the word ‘make’ is not used. Again: the clause to provide for the punishment of counterfeiting, &c., does not say to make laws, or appropriate money, yet both are constantly done. To provide a navy is not saying to build or make a navy. To provide for calling forth the militia does not say to make laws for calling them. The words to regulate commerce or declare war, do not necessarily mean to build lighthouses, purchase territory, grant pensions, appropriate millions to foreign embassies, and other objects of the like, which no one word in the Constitution was ever pretended to mean. And yet these things are every day done, and most of them very properly done. If the gentlemen want strictness in the sense for which they contend, let them in good earnest apply it to every part of the instrument; and this House must repeal more than one half of the laws in our statute book. All the post office laws, all the pension laws, all the lighthouse laws, and all appropriations for post roads, and many others. The remainder unrepealed would be small, and Congress, in future, would not find any very serious difficulty with the internal concerns of the Union; they would be left mostly to themselves. It would be the sea, and foreign matters principally, with which they would be engaged; a little war occasionally, and, when it came, we could neither march or transport an army, or the munitions of war, to a given point, until the evil was committed, and the danger past. This may be a very strict construction; but he believed it was not such as would maintain either the interest or safety of the Union.

Again, Mr. G. said, gentlemen contend that the enumeration of particular powers, after general ones, operated as an exclusion of all general ones, and that, too, by the force of such enumeration, barely. Gentlemen, Mr. G. said, would gain nothing for their argument, if this proposition were admitted, for the same difficulty would yet remain, namely, to fix the construction of the different enumerations, of which some are particular and general, and some general in themselves. But, Mr. G. said, he denied any such rule. The gentlemen say, that a particular enumeration of powers, by force of its particular character, barely supersedes all foregoing general powers which may include such particulars. The rule which he understood to be the sensible one, was, that the negative enumerations excluded or superseded general powers or rights, which would have passed, were it not for such negatives, but not by force, barely, of their particular enumerative character, but by that of their negative character. And another rule is, that, when things to be excluded from general powers are expressly named as excluded, they operate as an admission of all others not so named by negative words. Now, if the arguments of gentlemen were true, all the negative words in the Constitution are useless, and without meaning; because, if the bare enumeration of powers, not so general as other powers, by force of their bare enumeration, were to exclude all such general powers, then the negative words can have no effect; or, if they have any effect, then, inasmuch as they are particular enumerations, they exclude, as well without the negative words as with them. If this be true at all, it must be true in all cases, and then every and the smallest enumeration of any particular power would exclude all general power; and, as the Constitution professes to deal in general powers, some of which are more and some less general, and to rely for their exclusion in any particular case, on negative words, the consequence would be, that a smaller gift of power, by reason of its smallness, would exclude a general greater power. This, Mr. G. said, it appeared to him was neither sensible, true, nor safe. If the rule of gentlemen could obtain, the enumeration and negative would mean the same, and the reason why negative provisions were ever construed to imply powers not negated, is because they can be fairly deduced from the general provisions, and without the limitation of negative words, would have no restriction—it follows, then, that general powers, given in general words, may be exercised, unless where restrained or limited by negative words. "To provide for the common defence and general welfare," to make all laws which may be necessary and proper, are powers as large and general as words could make them. And how are they restrained? Why, by negative words or provisions in the instrument, in a great number of instances, among which are those relating to rights of persons, property, and States, viz: Private property shall not be taken without just compensation, no bill of attainder, or ex post facto law, shall be passed; the judicial power of the United States shall not extend to any suit against a State. These, with many other negative provisions of the instrument, restrain, not only the power of Congress, but that of other departments; and, most generally, from doing acts in themselves odious, or which would lead to oppression. If Congress should pass a law to sue a State, this law would be a dead letter. And why? Is it because the right to do so is taken away by a particular enumeration of powers? No. It is by virtue of an express negative given to such right.

Mr. G. said, he should not pretend to answer all the objections urged by the opposition. His principal view was to persuade himself that the Government, among all its strong and hard powers, might safely and constitutionally include some of the munificent and good ones. He hoped we were not forbidden to confer some blessings, some solid and lasting evidences, that the general happiness and prosperity is not entirely left out of a system which it is said more than any other was designed to promote both. He was not now prepared to defend any power which, in its tendency, should endanger either personal or State security; and it would be in time to oppose the exercise of such an one, when an opportunity was offered for it. That now contended for was, in his humble opinion, of an entirely opposite character. He should, therefore, support it, as the first direct step towards a system which was inseparably connected with the wealth and happiness of the Union.

The situation of the West, Mr. G. said, had been often referred to in the course of the debate, and, not unfrequently, for objects which ought not, in his opinion, to enter into this or any other debate on this floor. He should consider the West as an integral portion of the Union, as inseparable from it, and indispensable to it—not as the West on account of itself, but as giving its due share of power and importance to a great Union, which would be less without, and, of course, greater with it—a portion of the Union now an extreme, but which was shortly to form the great centre.

This portion of country, Mr. G. said, was watered by some of the largest rivers in the known world, embracing an extent, variety, and fertility of soil, not any where surpassed; with a climate happily adapted to the pursuits of husbandry or manufactures; it is rapidly peopling, and, without including any of its Southern provinces, produces for exportation, annually, more than three millions of dollars value, in products. Its rivers, which form the channels of transportation, unite their waters with the ocean at one place only, and that at a distance from the Atlantic cities, almost equal to a voyage to Europe, and more than equal to one to many of her provinces. Instead of rivers which flow East, to facilitate an intercourse, the mountain interposes its barrier; all these give indications of the design of distinct and separate empire. Rivers which are the principal channels of transportation, swell periodically, and are then most favorable to the object. This crowds upon their waters all the products at once; they all have but one direction, and simultaneously meet at the same market; this is situated at an unhealthy point, in a low latitude, fatal not only to the products, but to the lives of those engaged in their transportation. These circumstances, unhealthy climate, its tendency to destroy the product, the quantity necessarily thrown in at one period, all tend to render it the most improper and unfit and dangerous market in the world, to say nothing of the immense loss of property which occurs annually; that of human life, is an alarming evil to the West; there is scarcely a district or neighborhood which does not contain the widows and orphans of those who have fallen victims to the necessity of seeking this market, and this the only dangerous one in the Union. The business of transportation in the West, is necessarily in a great measure confined to the farmers; the price is too low to warrant the employment of many agents in the transportation. The growers are obliged to construct cheap vehicles, and go in person to effect a sale. During the period of the European wars, the price was such as afforded a rich inducement for the enterprise; now it is frequently less than the expense of transportation. And yet the citizen, incited by that enterprise which is so much the character of an American, whom no difficulties can discourage, over bad roads and dangerous rivers, from the bosom of a wilderness, still seeks a market, distant almost as Europe—not from choice, but necessity. But while he is compelled to seek it, it must not be forgotten that his enterprise and industry must constantly languish. Another circumstance, more applicable to this portion of the Union than to most others, was the fall of its banking institutions, an almost total drain of its specie; while the East preserves a considerable abundance. And will any one pretend that the West is less industrious and economical than the East?

These, Mr. G. said, were not, to his mind, local evils, and local and sectional complaints. They were all national objects of the first magnitude, and those which grew out of national and general circumstances. What is the remedy for them? A union of the waters of the Susquehanna and Ohio, or of the Lakes and Ohio, removes all these evils; it prostrates the mountain barrier; it converts an unsafe and unhealthy and deadly market to a safe and enriching one; it raises enterprise; it diffuses industry and wealth, not locally, not to the West alone, but to the whole nation—to Georgia and Maine, as well as to the banks of Missouri, and in equal proportion. It must be known that the net products of the West sell for but little more than one-half of the price of the same products in the East; at the same time the citizen of the West pays a heavy per cent. higher for all imported articles, than is paid by those of the East. This operates as a twofold drawback on Western capital and industry; and are these not all national objects? Is it not at all times a national object to save the useless waste of millions, which can always be appropriated to promote useful industry? Must we not, said Mr. G., equalize our markets, by cheapening and facilitating transportation, before we can undersell Europe in manufactures? And can it be denied that roads and canals are the true and sure foundation of manufactures? If internal improvements are useful to agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the fact of their being national objects is established; and then the argument, that they belong more properly to individual than to national enterprise, falls to the ground; for it is equally good against every national undertaking. The cost of a system of internal improvement is also urged as an objection. It is said that we owe a national debt, and that this must be paid, and a surplus revenue accumulated before we commence the system. Mr. G. said he wished that this very honest precaution had been thought of heretofore, when so many millions have been spent in useless objects, which he would not now name; and as for accumulation of revenue, that was not a law of the times; it had no place in our policy; and if internal improvements were not to be commenced until a surplus revenue was saved, he feared it would be a long period before their blessings would be felt; that he was anxious to see the debt paid and the revenue saved, and to attain the object, he should select a system of internal improvement. If this would not enable us to raise a revenue, he believed we should long remain poor; for he saw no other means which had not been tried. To this object he should, therefore, look with confidence. To this he was ready to devote a few millions, which, otherwise, would be lost. He was convinced that the interest, as well as the will of the nation, imperiously called for it, and that it should not be delayed a single moment.

When Mr. GAZLAY had taken his seat—

Mr. NEALE, of Maryland, said, he would not trespass long upon the patience of the Committee, which he had no doubt was an acceptable pledge at this late period of the discussion. But he would take the liberty to present, briefly, some of the conclusions to which his mind had been brought (upon the Constitutional question) in the examination which he had been able to give the subject, and to notice some of the arguments urged against the power of Congress to pass the bill under consideration. This Government, Mr. N. said, was a government of delegated powers—a limited government—but the limitation existed in relation to the number and character of the powers delegated to Congress by the Constitution, and not to the full and complete exercise of such as are delegated; to these he knew of no other limitation or check, but such as grew out of an exercise of a sound discretion in the public functionaries; and, for a proper and judicious exercise of such discretion, the conscience of each member, and the representative principle of our Government, furnish the only checks. In taking a view of the terms used in the Constitution, in the several grants of power to Congress, he did not believe more appropriate language could have been used to convey perfect and complete power to Congress over the several subjects mentioned. The terms used in the several grants of power taken in relation to the subjects specified, may be considered as convertible terms, and were intended to give to Congress full power over the several subjects mentioned, and over the necessary and proper means to carry such power into execution, to effectuate beneficial purposes. Mr. N. said, he would not disclaim any of the specified powers in the Constitution, to which the advocates of the bill had resorted, to show that the great objects looked to by the bill under discussion, were legitimate means to carry into execution such power, but he would deny the soundness of the argument drawn from the circumstance, that, as the friends of the bill selected different specified powers in the Constitution, to show that Congress had power to pass the bill, that the power, therefore, did not exist. Sir, said Mr. N., is it not obvious, and does it not frequently happen, that similar legislative acts are means necessary and proper to carry into execution various grants of power in the Constitution, and that the power of Congress to pass such acts may be fairly deducible from more than one of the specified powers contained in the Constitution; that, therefore, Congress has no power to pass such acts? In other words, it is saying that, because the power to act is given to Congress in more than one clause of the Constitution, therefore Congress has no right to act at all. Certainly such an argument is entitled to no weight.

In reference to that grant of power in the Constitution which says, "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads," Mr. N. said he had heard much criticism and refinement in argument, which he could not believe a good rule to adopt in construing the Constitution; but let us, for a moment, look to what results this mode of reasoning will bring us. It is contended by some gentlemen who resist the passage of this bill, upon the ground that it would violate State rights, that the power to "establish post roads," means nothing more than to designate the road on which the mail is to be carried, or to impart a legal character to such road, which gives the United States the right of way over it, conceding, however, that the State through which such road may pass, would have no right to obstruct or destroy it, by which the right of way would be rendered useless; but that it would be a violation of State rights for Congress to make a road through any State.

Mr. N. said, it appeared to him that gentlemen gained nothing in favor of State rights by this distinction; for the States have as much right to obstruct or destroy a road within their jurisdiction as to make one; and by this designation, or legal character imparted to the road, the State through which it may pass is prohibited from obstructing or destroying such road, which is as much an encroachment upon her sovereign rights, as to make such roads; and, if it is contended that the States have a right to obstruct or destroy such road, then the powers of Congress are limited, indeed, and the clause of the Constitution just referred to ought to read—Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads, provided the State, through which such road may pass, will consent thereto.

These, said Mr. N., are some of the conclusions to which such refinement in argument will lead us, and which he thought pretty conclusive of its fallacy. But, said Mr. N., that grant of power in the Constitution, which appeared to him most conclusive in favor of the right of Congress to pass the bill under consideration, and to proceed in the great work of internal improvement, which it is intended as a preparation for, is that which says, "Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States; and with the Indian tribes;" and here, for the purpose of presenting the view which he had taken upon this grant of power in as concise and brief a manner as possible, Mr. N. said, he would consider the subject of commerce in a three-fold point of view: first, foreign or external commerce, as regards the Union; second, internal commerce, as regards each particular State; and third, commerce among the several States, which may be denominated internal, as regards the Union, but external as regards particular States within the Union. Over foreign commerce, by virtue of the grant of power to regulate commerce, the Congress have always exercised complete control, and, consequently, over all the means necessary and proper to the exercise of that power, any part may be destroyed by prohibitory duties, or the whole by non-intercourse or embargo laws; and I presume it will not be denied that Congress may adopt the necessary means to originate foreign commerce where it does not exist, and all this in virtue of the grant of power to regulate commerce, precisely the same word that is used in relation to commerce among the several States. Again, said Mr. N., no one will deny that the States have power over commerce while confined within their respective limits; and it will be also conceded, that roads and canals are means necessary and proper, and (to use the expression of Mr. Madison's celebrated report) appropriate, also, to carry on commerce from one given point to another in the same State, and that these means are ordinarily resorted to for that purpose. Now, said Mr. N., as Congress have the same power over commerce among the several States as over foreign commerce, and as the States are prohibited by the 10th section of the 1st article of the Constitution from entering into any agreements or compacts with each other, which would be absolutely necessary to enable them to adopt judicious measures in relation to that branch of commerce, it seems to follow, as a necessary consequence, that Congress must have, and was intended by the wise framers of the Constitution to have, full power to adopt all necessary and proper measures to promote and carry on commerce among the several States, in as ample a manner as a State would have within its proper jurisdiction; and as roads and canals are the usual, necessary, and proper means adopted by the States, within their jurisdiction, it cannot be said that they are not necessary and proper means to carry into execution the power granted to Congress to regulate commerce among the several States. Again, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. N., if you deny to Congress the power contended for, to adopt all such measures as may be necessary and proper to regulate, to promote, to facilitate the commerce among the several States, that power is annihilated, it exists nowhere else in our Government, and it would follow, as a necessary consequence, that the power over those means so essential for promoting the wealth and happiness of this people, so essential to the well-being of all Governments, is not to be found in the United States, or in the States severally. Sir, said Mr. N., the conclusions to which I have been brought by this course of reasoning, is conclusive to my mind that the power granted to Congress, by the Constitution, to regulate commerce among the several States, gives to Congress the power to adopt the measures looked to by the bill under discussion, as necessary and proper to carry into execution such power. As my object in rising, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. N., was briefly to present some of my views of the Constitutional question which has been so elaborately discussed, I should forfeit the pledge I gave the Committee were I not now to conclude.

When Mr. N. concluded, a general call for the question resounded from all quarters of the House; when Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, rose, and requested that the Committee might rise.

The Committee then rose, and, having obtained leave to sit again, the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 9.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a memorial of the Mayor, Aldermen, and City Council of the City of Boston, stating that, of late years, several islands, lying in and around the harbor of that city, and which constitute the safety and defence of said harbor, have been greatly injured by the action of the waves, and of tempests; by which the existence and utility of the harbor is much endangered, and praying the aid of the National Government in the execution of such works as may be found necessary for the protection of these islands from annual dilapidation from the ocean and from the elements; which memorial was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

Mr. WEBSTER presented a remonstrance of merchants, manufacturers, mechanics, and others, of Boston, against the passage of the bill now pending before this House, "to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports;" the tariff of duties proposed by said bill, and the principles on which it is avowedly founded; as having a tendency, however different may be the motives of those who recommend them, to diminish the industry, impede the prosperity, and corrupt the morals of the people.—Referred.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented a memorial and remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the bill now pending before this House, "to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports," as containing principles and details deeply and injuriously affecting the rights and interests of almost every class of the people of the United States.

Mr. CAMBRELENG also presented a similar memorial, from the importers and venders of hardware in the city of New York, so far as the interest of that branch of the foreign commerce of the United States is concerned.

Mr. INGHAM presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania, entitled "A resolution for the better protection of domestic manufactures."

Mr. POINSETT presented a memorial of the citizens of Charleston, in South Carolina, against the passage of the bill now pending before this House, to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports; as calculated, in the opinion of the memorialists, most deeply to affect the great interests of the agricultural States, perhaps even to work their speedy and utter ruin.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, expressive of their opinion, that further aid and more effective measures should be adopted by the Congress of the United States, for the promotion and protection of American manufactures.

The said memorials, remonstrances, and resolutions, were committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union, to which is committed the bill to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of sundry aliens, residing in the city and county of New York, praying that the laws upon the subject of naturalization may be so amended as to afford greater facilities to foreigners, who may intend to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. CAMBRELENG presented the petition of sundry citizens of the city of New York, on behalf of the aliens who have signed the petition last presented.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial of the Trustees of the Columbian College in the District of Columbia, praying Congress to grant them a loan of fifty thousand dollars, for the term of ten years, at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable quarterly.

Mr. FARRELLY presented a petition of Johanna Collins, of the District of Columbia, wife of John Collins, praying to be divorced from her said husband, on the grounds of personal abuse and ill usage, and having abandoned her without making any provision for her maintenance.

Mr. KENT presented a memorial of the President and Directors of the Provident Association of Clerks, in the City of Washington, praying for certain alterations and modifications, therein mentioned, in the act incorporating the said association.

Mr. WRIGHT presented certain resolutions, adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, praying Congress to adopt measures for the gradual abolition of slavery, within the United States.

The said petitions were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. LETCHER presented a remonstrance of the State of Kentucky, against the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, on the occupying claimant laws of the State of Kentucky; which remonstrance was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER presented a memorial of Doctor James Smith, late Agent of Vaccination of the United States, calling the attention of Congress to the alarming increase of the small pox within the United States, and praying that measures may be adopted for the distribution of genuine vaccine matter throughout the United States, by the appointment of a central vaccine agent, or such other means as may be deemed most conducive to the public welfare; which memorial was referred to a select committee. And, Mr. GAZLAY, Mr. CONDUCT, Mr. FLOYD, Mr. ABBOT, and Mr. EATON, were appointed said committee.

H. OF R.

Mr. WRIGHT presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, in relation to the three per cent. fund reserved from the amount of sales of public lands in that State. Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, presented a memorial of the Columbian Institute, praying that a piece of public ground, in the City of Washington, therein described, may be granted to them, to be attached to, and made part of, their botanic garden; which was referred to a select committee; and Mr. CAMPBELL of Ohio, Mr. BRECK, Mr. HOLCOMBE, Mr. KENT, and Mr. POINSETT, were appointed said committee.

Mr. FRANCIS JOHNSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill to reduce into one the several acts establishing the Post Office Department; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Merchants' Bank, in Newport, Rhode Island," reported that, in the opinion of the committee, the said bill ought not to pass. The bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims, in the Territory of Florida," with amendments. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to revive and continue in force, an act, entitled 'An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives; of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian; in which amendments and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution laid on the table by Mr. COCKE, on Friday, was taken up, and agreed to, by the House.

Ordered, That the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of Henry Lee, be committed to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That leave be given to withdraw the petition and documents of Nathaniel Moffatt.

On motion of Mr. CRAFTS,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from St. Alban's, through Sheldon, to Berkshire, in the State of Vermont.

On motion of Mr. VINTON,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Gallipolis, by Vernon Northup's, to Burlington, the county seat of the county of Lawrence, in the State of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. MILLER,

Resolved, That the memorial of Warder and Brothers, attorneys in fact for the trustees of Fry and Spalding, formerly of the city of Philadelphia, which memorial is now on the files of this House, be, together with the accompanying documents, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Raleigh, North Carolina, to Haywood, in the county of Chatham.

On motion of Mr. MANGUM,

Resolved That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Raleigh, North Carolina, by way of the Fish Dam, Neuse, and Mount Tirza, to Roxborough.

MISSISSIPPI AND OHIO RIVERS.

Mr. WICKLIFFE offered a resolution directing an inquiry, by a select committee, what farther steps it was proper for the Government to take in relation to the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers.

Mr. WICKLIFFE stated that surveys and inquiries had been made on the subject, and were in possession of the proper department. The object of his resolution was to urge the Government to put those means into operation, of which they were already in possession. He was happy to find that even the opponents of the bill now pending on the subject of internal improvements, conceded that Government might, constitutionally, act on the improvement of the Mississippi. He would not detain the House with dilating on the importance of the measure to be accomplished, not only by those who were in the immediate vicinity of these rivers, but to the Union at large—the obstacles were such as might easily be removed, and whose removal would in a very short time repay its own expense fourfold.

After some conversation between the mover and Mr. COCKE, as to the reference of the resolution—

Mr. WICKLIFFE consented to withdraw it for the present, till further information was obtained.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill for obtaining the requisite surveys and estimates on roads and canals.

Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, addressed the Chair as follows:

I would not, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. L., have obtruded myself at all on the attention of the Committee—most certainly, not at this late stage of the debate, but for an idea that has been frequently thrown out, sometimes in the tone of complaint, sometimes in that of reproach, but always with an assumption of the fact, that those who support this measure, do it without a due regard to the Constitution; that there are those in this House, (and they are spoken of as a body, having a common object, and common tenets,) who, to attain any great political object, think that the end justifies the means; and that the Constitution is to be disregarded whenever its provisions oppose that which their zeal and heated imaginations prompt them to believe is for the public good; that they (naturally enough, if such be their principles,) discourage all Constitutional objections, and think it idle to discuss them.

Now, sir, if there be any who support the bill on these principles, I must assure the House, and the nation, that they are not mine; if there be such a sect, of which I have no other evidence than the charges I have alluded to, it is a duty I owe to myself, to disclaim them and their tenets, to renounce all kind of community with them, and declare my utter abhorrence of the political doctrines that are attributed to them. Independent of the oath we have all registered in Heaven, to support the Constitution, there is such an absurdity, as well as depravity, in avowing a disregard to that Constitution, from which alone we derive our individual political existence, and pointing to any national object, however splendid, as a justification for subverting that, without which, neither it nor any of its institutions, can exist—as cannot, without a reproach to this honorable body, be supposed to attach to any of its members.

How far the discussion of Constitutional questions has heretofore been discouraged, I know not; but, for myself, I have always considered them as of the highest importance; and cannot believe that the time is ever lost, which is employed in examining the character and bearings and true construction of that excellent form of Government, which, I trust, is to connect us forever.

I stand, sir, in a situation, with regard to the measure proposed by this bill, that is not common to many, perhaps to none of the members of the Committee. This subject has been, in the Atlantic and Western States, one that occupied public attention for many years; it has been the object of discussion in this House, and of disquisitions in the papers, and in private discourse, until the arguments have become trite, and almost every individual, whose opinion is of any worth, has formed one on the question.

In the remote part of the Union where I live, the political questions which agitate the other States, do not acquire so intense an interest. The debates of Congress are not frequently republished; the people, in general, having the most unbounded confidence in the wisdom of the National Government, do not pretend to direct it by their suggestions; hence, it happens, that this great object was not forced upon my attention; and that, wholly absorbed by professional duties, and some of a public nature, closely connected with professional pursuits, I came here with no other than general impressions on the propriety of the measure now under discussion. I had no favorite system to support; no pride of opinion to gratify; but brought to the debate a mind sincerely open to conviction, and unbiassed by any prejudice; or, if I had any leaning, it was one which led me to guard against any assumption of power, by the General Government, in derogation of those vested in the States; a habit of thinking, acquired very early in my political life, one that was fostered by all my associations, as well as confirmed by reflection—and although I do not now apprehend so much danger from that quarter, as I once did, although I see none in the present measure, yet I am not disposed to yield the honor, the danger, or even the reproach, of protecting the Constitution and the State rights, to those who seem to assume the character of their exclusive defenders.

In this disposition, it was with unfeigned satisfaction I witnessed the recommitment of the bill, and that I listened to the very able and instructive debate that has ensued. The result has been, a perfect conviction of the expediency, and the removal of every doubt as to the constitutionality of the measure. If I entertained a doubt, sir, I should not act; and I agree perfectly with the gentlemen from Virginia, (Mr. S.,) that, if we have a doubt relative to any power, we ought not to exercise it. No powers are vested in the Government but those that are given; and, to assume one that we are not convinced is vested in us, is as great a breach of the Constitution, as to do that which the Constitution forbids. And, I repeat, that, if I entertained a single doubt of the power to pass this bill, I should vote against it.

With as sacred a regard for the Constitution as is professed, and no doubt felt, by any of the opposers of this bill, with as high a sense of the importance of preserving State rights, unimpaired, as any of them entertain, I proceed to the particular examination of the question before the Committee.

A great latitude has been taken in this discussion, which it does not become me to reprehend, particularly when I reflect on the pleasure and instruction I have received from the excursive debate. But, although I do not blame, I cannot follow all the ingenious views that have been taken of the subjects connected and unconnected with the question. I must, therefore, confine myself to that before the Committee—that is to say, whether we have the power to make such roads and canals as are necessary and proper, for transporting the mail, for facilitating military operations, or the commerce between the different States.

Most, perhaps I might with propriety say, all, who oppose the bill, have attributed a character to the measure which does not belong to it, and have then employed themselves in showing those characters to be unconstitutional or dangerous.

I will endeavor to strip the question of those adventitious features before I discuss it.

1st. It is assumed that the power claimed by the bill is that of jurisdiction, (exclusive jurisdiction, some say,) over the roads and canals that may be made.

But neither in the bill, nor in the opinions of those who support it, do we find any claim to such jurisdiction; it is found only in the arguments of those who oppose it. I did hope, in some of the speeches that assumed this ground, to have heard some argument, to show that such jurisdiction was inherent in the nature of the power, or that some express Constitutional provision made it so. If any thing of the kind has been attempted, it has escaped my attention. I did hear, indeed, that Congress had power to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over places that should be purchased by consent of the States for "arsenals, forts, and other needful buildings;" but the analogy between roads and such places, was not attempted to be shown; but, even if it had, no conclusion in favor of the necessity of such jurisdiction can be drawn from the practice under that clause—because, so far from being inseparable from the power to purchase and hold forts and arsenals, &c., the jurisdiction has, in point of fact, in most cases where such cessions and purchases have been made, been concurrent with that of the States—a large majority of those cessions having been made sub modo, some reserving one privilege and jurisdiction, others those of a different kind. An examination of the different acts of cession will convince the members of this fact. No argument to suit the present subject can be drawn from that clause in the Constitution. There is no analogy between the cases, and, if there were, the exclusive jurisdiction is not inseparable from the one to which they refer. Is there any thing in the nature of the power that requires this jurisdiction? Congress surely may make a road or a canal—may even pass laws to prevent their being injured—to secure the safe passage of their mail or military supplies over them, without having exclusive, or any other jurisdiction over the soil. Some of their penal laws now extend particularly to offences committed against the free passage of the mail. Some of them inflict capital punishment. They are duly executed. Yet no one has hitherto considered that, for this reason, the General Government had any other jurisdiction than that which is totally unconnected with any locality, which pervades all the States, and operates on the crime, no matter in what part of the Union it may be committed. Of this nature, are the laws against counterfeiting bank notes or public securities. To say, then, that, because it is necessary to pass laws for the protection of the roads, therefore a power must be implied to exercise jurisdiction over them, is to say that Congress have the same jurisdiction over every part of each State, because Congress has the power to punish infractions of their laws everywhere.

The idea, then, of an exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of this power, or of any jurisdiction at all, is wholly unfounded—unprovided for by the bill, disavowed by its advocates, not required by the nature of the power, and raised by the opposers to it, only from the dearth of more tenable grounds of opposition. Yet, strip the argument of this ground, which has been insisted on by, I believe, all who have spoken on the subject, and one-half, at least, of the opposition falls with it.

Secondly. Analogous to this is the idea that, in order to make a road, the property of the soil is necessary.

If it were, I do not well see what objection can be raised from this circumstance, to the existence of the power; it might be an impediment to its exercise; individuals might refuse to sell, and then it would be a matter of discretion, whether to exercise the power given by the Constitution to take the property on paying an equivalent; but this belongs to the detail of a bill for laying out a particular road, but cannot be raised as an objection to the legality of the power.

The right to erect beacons and lighthouses is not questioned; and it must be admitted that the property of the soil is more necessary there than in the case of a road; yet, I well remember an instance, where the owner of a strip of barren land, near the lighthouse at Sandy Hook, refused to sell so much as was necessary for the erection of a beacon, without a very large compensation, (I believe one thousand dollars.) The Treasury refused to purchase, but erected the beacon without permission. The owner sued the collector, recovered heavy damages, and, finally, the United States were obliged to pay for the land double the sum at first required. Now, this difficulty might as well have been urged against the general power to erect beacons, as the necessity of owning the soil can be in the case of roads; but, in the case of roads, no such necessity exists; it may be exercised, leaving the property of the soil in the first owner, but burdened only with a right of way.

Let us discard, then, this suggestion, also, as one totally irrelevant to the question, or, at best, drawing our attention to details, when we are discussing Constitutional objections to the whole measure.

Thirdly. Another impediment to be removed, before we can come to a fair discussion of the subject, is, the play that has been made on the word "internal." First, the bill is improperly called a bill for "internal improvement." Then, the word "internal" is applied to the interior of the different States; and, after this ingenious process, we are triumphantly asked in what part of the Constitution we find the power to meddle with the internal concerns of the States? It is in vain that the advocates of the bill have told them—"Nowhere. That is not the power we contended for—that is neither the title nor the purpose of the bill." They still declaim on this objection; and the tendency of the argument is, that we must show an express authority to make roads and canals for State, not for general purposes; or, that the measure must be abandoned. I have thought it necessary to guard against the error that has pervaded the argument, by this perversion of terms, and to state that, so far as I consider the object as one tending to internal improvement, it is as applicable to the whole Union; and this improvement is not the primary object, the inevitable consequence of the exercise of our Constitutional powers, in relation to the carriage of the mail, the regulation of commerce between the States, and the facility of military operations, which alone, are the objects of this bill.

Fourthly. Again, it is insisted, the power necessarily implies that of creating corporations, with exclusive privileges and dangerous powers.

If I thought so, I should hesitate. I am, in general, no friend to those institutions, and I have always doubted the right of Congress to create them. The great exercise of this power, by incorporating the Bank of the United States, took place before I came into public life, and the renewal of its charter was made after I had left it.

How I should have voted, on either of those occasions, after hearing the discussion, I cannot tell; nor is it necessary now to anticipate what course it may be proper to pursue, as to any measure of that kind that may, hereafter, be proposed in relation to the subject of this bill. But, so far from acknowledging that my support of it should be considered as advocating this and other doubtful powers, I have no hesitation in saying that I consider the institution of banks, both under the State and General Government, as a principal cause of the embarrassments we have suffered, do suffer, and will suffer, while their operations are unrestrained; and that if, without injury to public faith, they could all be annihilated, it would prove a blessing to the country. This may seem a departure from the subject before us, but it was necessary to testify that my vote will not be founded on any assumption that the right of making incorporations is involved in that of making roads and canals. But, that this, with the other topics I have discussed, being supposed to be of more doubtful propriety, in the exercise, than that which is truly before us, were ingeniously attached to it, in order to impede its passage. Neither of these, then, is the question. Two present themselves under the proposed bill. Has the Government of the United States a Constitutional right to make such roads and canals as are necessary and proper for the transportation of the mail—for the giving facility to their military operations, and to the commercial intercourse between the States?

If they have, it is expedient to exercise that power, so far as is provided by this bill?

My assent to the affirmative of these propositions is given to the precise statement they contain, not to those which it has been deemed proper to substitute for them.

Having stated, with precision, what I consider to be the terms and extent of the power, the next inquiry is, What are its characteristics and its nature?

All legislative power must of right have residence in the people. In all independent and free States, the power is equally extensive, until they transfer it by Constitutional laws, or restrain it by compact.

In all the different States of this Union, the people, in the very act of Constitutional legislation, transferred all other legislative power to their Representatives, reserving to themselves the power of designating those who should make and execute the laws; and the ulterior power of organic legislation as often as changes should become necessary.

Under this distribution of the mass of legislative power, the States formed, first, a combination, growing out of a common interest, and held together by common danger, rather than by virtue of any express compact. Afterwards, by the imperfect league called the Confederation,—and, lastly, by the happy Constitution we now enjoy.

The first of these, the Confederation, involved in its formation a departure from principle: for, although it made a material change in the fundamental principles of each Government, the people were not consulted. It was adopted by the Legislatures of the different States, to whom the people had given, as we have seen, no right to alter their organic laws.

The present Government was differently constructed, and more legally established. A short review of its principal features may throw some light on the present question.

It cannot be ranked in any of the classes of government established by writers on that subject. It is neither a consolidated government nor a federative—but one partaking of both. A constitution sui generis, original in its conception, containing a most happy combination of powers, calculated to cover an indefinite extent of country, without danger of weakness or oppression, containing the means of adapting itself, by judicious amendment, to all the changes that time and circumstance may require, and already become the model by which foreign nations are forming their political institutions.

The features of consolidation are evident, first, in the formation of the Government. It is in the name of the people of the United States—it was submitted to them and received their sanction. Second, by its provisions. The people are represented, in one of its branches, in proportion to their numbers. Each man is a citizen of the whole nation. The army is the Army of the United States. The navy is the Navy of the nation. We have all common enemies—common friends. Our currency, our discoveries, our literature, our commerce, our weights and measures, are ours as citizens of the United States, independent of the State authorities. And, to give effect to these rights, we have a great national Judiciary, and an Executive power, belonging to the whole.

With all these characteristics of consolidation, it has others, and most valuable they are, of a federative nature. The State governments, although they did not finally adopt, yet gave it their previous assent, without which it would not have been submitted to the people. They are severally, and without any regard to their population, equally represented in the Senate. When the people disagree, they decide on the choice of the First Magistrate. And they retain the residuum of legislative power which is not vested in the General Government, or retained by the people.

Whether the powers in question are among those granted, or whether they were retained by the States or the people, is the question to be decided.

Legislative power, (I pray the Committee to pardon the didactic style of this part of my address to them; I speak with sincerity and humility when I say, that most, if not all, of them, are better able to instruct me, than I am to teach them any thing on this subject—but I am forced to define, because I have observed, that we do not at all use the same words in the same sense)—legislative power may be divided into political and civil powers.

By political powers, I mean such as have for their immediate object the regulation and welfare of the whole body politic, whether on its internal or its external concerns, and which acts on the whole mass of the people, in their aggregate capacity.

Civil power, such as acts immediately on the citizens, individually, for the protection of their persons, reputation, and property.

Political power must affect individuals in its operation, and civil power must ultimately, in its exercise, produce political effects; but the immediate operation of the one or the other, constitutes the distinction between them.

Frequent use has been made, in this debate, of the term municipal power. In its original and proper sense, this term meant the powers exercised by the conquered towns to whom the policy of Rome left the choice of their own magistrates, and the regulation of their interior affairs.

A more extensive signification has, however, been given to it, by Blackstone and others. They use it so as to comprehend every species of legislation, and include in the term municipal law, all laws but those of nature and of nations.

In this sense, it would include political as well as civil powers, and be as much too extensive, as, in its proper sense, it would be too confined for our purpose. I shall therefore altogether decline the use of the term.

The establishment of organic laws, is the first and most important exercise of political legislation. This, as we have seen, has in our country been exercised by the people, specially represented for that particular purpose. But other powers of political legislation are given to the Governments they have instituted. To which? The General or State Governments?

As a general rule, all political powers, (under this understanding of them,) which relate to the United States, as a nation, together with certain enumerated civil powers, were, by the Constitution, vested in the National Government.

All civil powers, with so many of a political nature as are necessary for the exercise of the State governments, are vested in the States.

What is the nature of the powers in question, most clearly political, and of that class which apply to the United States as a nation?

They act immediately for the benefit of the whole nation, and upon the whole mass. The carriage of the mail, the roads and canals for military operations, the facility given to commerce between the States, are all of this description.

They are, then, a portion of that general legislative power, which resided in the people. They cannot be annihilated, and must be found, either in the State governments, the General Government, or undisposed of, in the hands of the people.

It is not presumable that the people intended that these powers, so important to their convenience, to their happiness, to their very existence as a nation, should lie dormant. Some of them were exercised by the confederation of States, even prior to any compact. At the very moment when they sprung into political existence, they considered themselves as one people. Their declaration uses those very expressions, and by common consent their deputies raised armies, declared war, issued letters of marque, emitted money, built forts, and established a general post office. Nay, they even exercised the doubtful power of chartering a bank. Now, can it be supposed, I repeat, that a people, familiar with the exercise of these important powers, by the National Government, when this was found too weak, and they were called on to enlarge and strengthen it, should not only take from their national rulers, but absolutely annihilate any of those essential powers? This cannot reasonably be supposed; and if the powers be not found in the State governments, or in the people, they must be in the General Government.

But they are not in the State governments.

1. Because they exist only with the existence of the General Government. As they relate to no one State in particular, but to all, considered as a whole, no one State could exercise them prior to the union of all into one nation. If roads are necessary for the carriage of the mail or for military operations, or either canals or roads for facilitating commerce, it is the mail of the whole United States; they are the military operations of the nation; it is the commerce, not of one State, but between the several States as members of the Union. No individual State, nor any number short of the whole, therefore, could be the depository of this power. But, if it be a power resulting from a State right, each one must have a concurrent right and a concurrent power to do that which, from its very nature, can only be effected by one will. This involves an absurdity in terms. Therefore, on this ground, it is not a power reserved by the States.

2. It is not such a power, because its exercise by any one State would involve the right in that State of judging and determining what is for the benefit of the whole—a right nowhere given, and destructive of that equality which is the basis of the Union. But every right supposes a corresponding obligation. Hence, on the hypothesis that it is a reserved power still existing in the States, each one has a right which all the others must be bound to obey, and which yet each one of all the others have an equal right to counteract and disobey. To exemplify this: If the right to designate and make a post road for the United States be one reserved by the States, (each one possessing it, as we have seen, in an equal degree;) if any one State shall designate the route of the mail, and make a proper road for its conveyance, all the others must be under an obligation not to interfere with its exercise, or else it is no right. But the route, so designated, is inconvenient to one of the other States, who, by virtue of her reserved right, establishes another post road; which of these is the true one on which the obligation is to operate? This absurdity cannot be avoided by saying, as has been said, let each State make and establish the road within its own boundaries; because it is the post road of the United States, for the carriage of the mail of the nation, not a road for State purposes, about which we are speaking. A road may be very convenient for a State, and very inconvenient for the United States. A road very necessary for the carriage of the mail may be, from natural impediments, too expensive to be made by the funds of the State through which it passes. In short, those who talk of State roads, and those who argue for the right of making a road for the mail of the United States, speak of totally different things, and under this misunderstanding the debate may be infinitely prolonged.

3. Again: the making the post road may be considered as a right, or as an obligation, according to its operation either as a benefit or an injury. If it be a right, there must be some power to enforce it; but there is none, and we have seen there is no corresponding obligation. Therefore, it does not exist as a right in any of the States individually.

If it be an obligation, in whom does the corresponding right exist? If in the United States, the question is settled, but in a manner the most injurious to State rights. If it be an onerous obligation on one State to make roads for the benefit of the whole, it is most unequal in its operation, as well as unjust in its principle; and therefore cannot readily be supposed to exist in either shape.

4. When we add to these reasons, drawn from the nature of the powers, those which result from the expressions of our national compact, and which clearly evince a design to vest them in the General Government, no doubt will remain that the States did not intend to retain the powers in question for their own exercise.

These will be more fully developed hereafter. At present I only indicate, as proofs of this renunciation, the clauses which give the regulation of the Post Office Establishment the direction of the national defence, and the regulation of commerce between the States to the General Government; the renunciation of any right to enter into any compact between the States without the assent of Congress, and the abandonment to the Union of all the common funds, without which no system of general improvement can be carried on.

For these reasons, it may be fairly concluded that the States did not intend to retain this power in themselves. Is it retained by the people? This inquiry is easily answered. We have seen that, in the formation of the State governments, the people vested in them all the legislative power, retaining only the right of making Constitutional changes, and of electing the administrators of their Government. But the power in question is a legislative power; therefore, the people did not retain it.

If, then, it be neither in the people nor the State governments, as it is a necessary power, it cannot be annihilated, except by express compact. It is not pretended that any such compact exists. It is not, then, annihilated, but exists somewhere; not, as we have seen, either in the State governments or in the people—in one or the other of which, by the 10th amendment to the Constitution, all residuary power is vested. Where, then, is it to be found? By necessary consequence, in the General Government.

This, sir, I shall now proceed more fully to show, premising that I bear constantly in mind the great principle with which I set out, that the General Government has no powers, and can exercise none but such as are given by the Constitution, and that all that is not given is retained by the States or the people. This would have been the true mode of testing the rights of the Constitutional power, if the 10th amendment had never been made. The people and the States gave. Whatever they did not give, they of course retain. Let me remark, that this amendment does not use the language inaccurately, in this debate, sometimes attributed to it. It does not say all is retained that is not expressly given; but, simply, "all powers that are not delegated to the United States, nor prohibited to the States, are retained," &c. To have used the word "expressly," would have been to violate all rules of construction, and to have rendered the Constitution totally inoperative. It was the design of the wise men who framed the instrument that it should be construed by the same rules that apply to every other grant; that the plain intent of the parties, to be gathered from the words of the compact itself, should govern; that the grant of a principal power should carry with it all its necessary incidents, and that the whole instrument should be taken together, in order to ascertain its true meaning.

These, sir, are the only rules of construction which I mean to use; this is the utmost latitude of argument I shall take, and I repeat again, that I disclaim any exercise of the power, unless I can show it to be clearly granted; and that, if I could think any constitutional State right violated by it, I should as instantly abandon my support of the measure, as any of those who now oppose it—being determined never, in any situation in which I may be placed, to yield to any man, or set of men, a title to the exclusive appellation of defenders of State rights, or of the Constitution.

The powers, of which this bill proposes the exercise, I conceive to be vested in the Government of the United States:

First, by necessary implication. They are political powers of legislation, having for their object the whole of the Union. If this be a true description of them, it was evidently the intent of the people to vest them in the United States, unless they intended to annihilate them. It has been shown, I think, conclusively, that they were not retained. But the nature of the powers in question is such as will not permit us to believe that a wise people intended to destroy, or suffer them to lie dormant. Can we suppose for a moment that powers to provide effectually for the transmission of the mail, for the march of troops, and the carriage of military stores, and rendering commercial intercourse easy between the different States, are such as were intended never to be brought into action? Yet, this must be the result of such a construction as denies them to the General Government; for, I repeat, the people have not retained them, and, by the compact we are construing, the States have deprived themselves of the power of exerting them. Therefore, unless they are found in the Union; they are lost, utterly annihilated. No, sir; powers so little liable to abuse, (I might, without exaggeration, say,) so incapable of being abused, productive of so much good, interfering with no civil right, so necessary to social intercourse, so essential to the maintenance of the Union, to its defence, and the common prosperity of all its members; such powers cannot be supposed to have been designedly annihilated, and we may boldly pronounce that construction of the Federal compact to be a false one which supposes it.

But the question does not rest wholly on an implied grant of power, however strong that implication may be. There is, on the fairest and best received rules of construction, a clear grant of each of the powers contended for.

Let us take them in their order, and not attempt, as has been erroneously imputed to us, to derive all the three powers from a single provision. We shall thus take away from the opposers of the bill the argument that its advocates must be wrong, because they have relied on different clauses of the Constitution for the power they contend for—an argument that arises only from the false position which it has been found convenient to assume. That the bill is intended to establish a single power, which they have denominated the power of making internal improvement; and because no authority could be found for this imaginary power, neither asserted in the bill, nor contended for by those who support it, we are told that no one of the different clauses, which have been relied on to authorize the different measures proposed, being sufficient to cover the whole, or to empower us to make a general system of internal improvement, in their sense of the word, therefore, the reliance on so many different parts of the Constitution is evidence of error, which is infinite in its aberrations from the singleness of truth. This is ingenious reasoning. But, to put an end to it at once, let us again go to the bill. It proposes no exercise of any one power, either nominally or actually a system for the internal improvement of the States. Its object is three-fold:

To provide the preparatory measures for hereafter making such canals and roads as are necessary and proper;

For the carriage of the mail;

For military operations;

And for facilitating the commerce between the States.

If we find an authority to effect each of these objects, in different parts of the Constitution, it will be sufficient for our purpose.

The clause respecting the Post Office power has been so often commented on, and every word in it so curiously dissected, that I shall not enter the lists in this philological contest. I take a broader ground, and, whatever may be the precise meaning of the word establish, in the language from which it is derived, or in the strict sense of its proper employment in our own, I ask any man of plain understanding to consider the nature of the power, the certainty that it cannot be exercised by the States, and the improbability of its being intended to lie dormant—then to read the following provision: "Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads;" and to determine for himself, whether this grant of power, made under such circumstances, was not intended to give to the United States the general direction, the complete control of the Post Office Establishment; whether any thing essential to its exercise was intended to be reserved; in other words, whether it was not a complete transmission of the power in all its parts to the grantees? If this be answered in the affirmative—and can there be a doubt that it must be—it follows as a necessary consequence, one repeatedly admitted in debate, (and indeed so clearly provided for in the Constitution as not to be denied,) that the incidental power of doing every thing necessary and proper to execute the principal one, passed with it. What is the principal power? The regular and safe transmission of the mail to every part of the United States. What is required for this transmission? Of necessity, roads; for convenience, good and direct roads. What does the bill propose? To provide such roads as are necessary and proper for the conveyance of the mail; therefore, demonstrably, logically, the bill assumes no power not given under this head by the Constitution. We do not assume the right of jurisdiction, nor the right of making roads where they exist. The true argument lies in a narrow compass; we have the right to transmit the mail, it cannot be transmitted at all without roads, nor conveniently, without good and direct roads. Therefore, by virtue of the ancillary powers expressly given, we may make roads where there are none, and repair them where they are bad.

Where sufficient roads already exist, it would be neither necessary nor proper to make others; and it would be both a breach of our Constitutional duty, and of the principles on which this bill is framed, to assume that power. This is all, sir, I shall say as to the Constitutional clause respecting post offices and post roads. And I hope it is sufficient, on a fair construction of it, to show that the power of making such roads is one of those evidently intended to be vested in the Congress of the United States, and not retained, because impossible to be executed by the States individually.

Another object of this bill is to provide such roads and canals, and only such, (in this view,) as are necessary for the purposes of defence. This power is so evidently given, that I believe it has been generally conceded to exist. It has, indeed, been exercised in different parts of the Union to a great extent, and has not excited, that I have heard, the slightest sensation. A road of this description was made in the State of New York, from the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain; another from Nashville to New Orleans. Yet, no one imagined that the President, who, I believe, directed the one of these operations, and the Congress, which provided for the other, had exceeded their powers. Happy would it have been for the honor, for the safety, and the finances of the country; if, previous to the late war, this power had been more generally exercised. The ignominious surrender of a whole territory—the lives of thousands of brave men, and an incalculable expense in transportation, would have been spared. Sir, we have heard, and the fact is undoubted, that, when provisions did reach your men on the Erie and Michigan frontier, they lost more than ten times their original price in transportation; that frequently the loads were so long on the route as to be totally consumed for the necessary food of the conductors: and perhaps it would be no great exaggeration to say that your artillery cost nearly its weight in silver before it arrived on the field of action. This power, then, has been either not at all or very faintly denied. But a singular objection is raised to its exercise—that, if constructed, these roads and canals will be used for the purposes of internal commerce, and for the conveyance of the mail. Now, as Congress have no power, according to these gentlemen, to make post roads or commercial canals, we are told that the Constitution forbids the mail coach to rattle over a military road, or a commercial cargo to be wafted over a military canal. If this be true, it is unfortunate for the Postmaster General's Department and for the merchants; but it is surely no argument against the power to construct military roads and military canals, that, by a wicked abuse of power, they may afterwards serve the most unconstitutional and impolitic and ruinous purpose of transmitting the mail or increasing the commerce between the different States. If what is meant be, that this power, which is acknowledged, may serve as a pretext for the exercise of others which are denied, I answer again, that this would be an abuse of power which ought not to be supposed, and cannot justly be reasoned from. When we perform these operations for military purposes they must be bona fide such. And I, for one, sir, shall surely not regret if, in its consequences, the commerce and convenience, as well as the defence, of the Union is promoted by them.

The bill also assumes the right of making roads and canals for facilitating the commerce between the States; and this branch of the subject has excited the greatest degree of opposition, and the greatest talent and ingenuity in the debate. The argument has chiefly turned on the word "regulate," used in making the grant of power over the commerce between the States. I shall here, as in the former instance, forbear any attempt at etymological disquisition, or nice inquiries into derivation; I pursue the only, the true inquiry—What, from the nature of the case, and the whole tenor of the instrument, appears to have been the intent of the parties? What sense would a man of plain good understanding, not a professed grammarian, critic, or philologist, affix to it? The instrument was made by the people, and for their use; the popular, not the learned signification of the term must therefore be sought. We may be aided in this search, not only by the import of the whole instrument and by a consideration of the purposes for which it was formed, but by the construction, I mean the practical construction, that was put on it after it went into operation.

No man has a higher idea than I have of the talents and extensive political views employed in the work that has been so frequently quoted here to illustrate the meaning of different parts of the Constitution; but I always read such works, as well as the debates of the Convention, with some diminution of confidence, when I reflect that every man at that period, of any talent, was enlisted on one side or the other, in the great question whether the Constitution should be adopted or not. All the writings of that day are arguments; the friends of the measure softened, its enemies exaggerated, all the powers of the proposed Government; and it seems to me, that arguments made under such circumstances are not calculated to produce the same respect that the great names of Madison, Henry, Jay, and Hamilton, would otherwise inspire.

It is not, therefore, to the Federalist, or to the debates in the conventions, that we should recur for instructive commentaries on our Constitution; like most other commentaries, they frequently obscure the text; but the practical construction is not liable to these objections, and on the point before us is capable of affording the greatest instruction.

Seldom did a Government go into operation under more trying circumstances; it had been adopted by bare majorities in several of the States. The opposition to it was soured by ill success, and embittered by the acrimonious debates it had occasioned; its friends, the most violent and inconsiderate part of them at least, were elated by their triumph, and were supposed to nourish ulterior views, of changes leading to consolidation, to hereditary office, and other measures inconsistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution they had established. Leaders of both these parties were elected in the two legislative branches, and there (as was inevitable) two parties were formed, each suspecting the other of views hostile to the Government. The one by increasing its powers by construction, until the State authorities were destroyed, and, as one of the means of doing it, giving improper energy and influence to the Executive branch—the other by encroachment of the State powers on those of the Federal head, and reducing it again to the imbecility of the Confederation. While each party believed the other actuated by such motives, the utmost jealousy of every measure proposed by either, was inevitable, particularly in the first few years after it went into operation, when a permanent character was to be impressed by the measures it should adopt.

I speak, sir, of the scenes which immediately preceded and followed the adoption of the Government, with perfect recollection. I saw it spring into existence, and was witness to the pangs and throes which gave it birth; the great change was not produced without struggles that had nearly convulsed the nation to its extinction; private interest, State pride, local views, fears of unknown changes, a dread of the encroaching nature of Executive power, and of military establishments, and a sincere but mistaken idea that the individual States would soon fall a sacrifice to the consolidated power of the whole; arrayed a great and powerful party against the establishment before it took place; and, subsequently, continued to operate, though in a less degree.

A very short time afterwards I was honored with a seat in this House, and found myself associated with men who thought themselves called on, by what they believed the views of their opponents against the independence of the States, to observe, with the most jealous care, every measure that could, in the remotest degree, affect them. That these suspicions might, in the warmth of party feeling, have, in some instances, been carried too far, may, perhaps, in the candor of cooler moments, be admitted; but certainly, they cannot, with justice, be accused of any want of attention to every appearance of encroachment, or of the want of courage to oppose it; nor was the ability to discover, or the talent, when discovered, to expose any such measures, wanting in the men of whom I speak.

We had Madison, whose energy of thought formed a singular contrast with his mildness of language and the suavity of his manners, who always addressed himself at once to the understanding of his hearers, without any treacherous attempt on their interest or passions; whose comprehensive mind embraced every possible view of his subject, and whose patient investigation left no argument unanswered, no sophism undetected, no false position unrefuted: Madison, whose works are, even in his life time, consulted as the oracles of truth, and whose fame will survive while admirers can be found for genius, patriotism, and virtue.

Gallatin, a host in himself, one of the most extraordinary examples of the power of genius, guided by integrity and pure political principles—eloquent, and often irresistible, in a language not his own—inferior to no native in a knowledge of the laws and Constitution of his adopted country; he stood among the first of those who then thought themselves specially called on to defend them.

We had Giles, who, to an unrivalled talent for debate, added a most extensive knowledge of the bearing of each part of the Government on the whole, a stock of political information, ready to be called into use on demand, and an independence of spirit and political courage, perfectly regardless of personal consequence; a gentleman, I may be permitted to add, whose absence from the councils of the nation will always be felt whenever they are occupied with a Constitutional question.

There was another, who still enjoys the uninterrupted confidence of his countrymen, in another branch of this Legislature: when I say that I mean the Cato of republicanism, whose delenda est was applied to every abuse, every extravagance, and every species of corruption, I need not write the name of Macon under the picture.

In speaking of those who were considered as the champions of State rights, and the firm opposers of consolidation, it is impossible not to remember the name of Nicholas, than whom a better man, a sounder politician never lived, nor a more independent spirit ever quitted this world for a better.

There is yet one, sir, to whom I must allude, although I do it at the risk of offending the delicacy of an honorable member of this House, then in the vigor of youth; he joined indefatigable exertion to that enthusiastic love of liberty which will never leave him but with life; he was the Murat of the party; he disdained defensive warfare; and, wherever the measures of our opponents were assailable, he made them feel the keen edge of his satire, or the irresistible charge of his argument.

With these men I went, sir—Sed non passibus æquis. They surpassed me in every thing but a sincere love of the Constitution, and an ardent zeal in its defence. My vanity, however, is satisfied with the idea that my name will sometimes be associated with theirs, without the slightest pretension that my utmost exertions in the same cause will be ever compared to the least of theirs.

To these might be added many others, who gave occasional assistance in debate, and a list of worthies, who, like the "fortemque Gyam fortemque Cloanthum" of the Poet, may be characterized by an epithet common to them all—they were good men and true, whose names stand on your Journals in goodly columns, to record the firm negative with which they made the Hall resound, whenever any proposition was made that might be construed into an attack on State rights, or that squinted towards consolidation.

Such were the men, sir, who conceived themselves called on, by every motive of principle and patriotism, to prevent any false construction of the powers of the General Government, particularly such as was calculated to increase those powers. Their zeal was increased, and their talents kept constantly in exercise, by daily collision with men, whose talents, and genius, and eloquence, made them worthy to enter the lists with those I have described. The minds of those who had to grapple with Ames, and Bayard, and Harper, and Otis, and Dexter, were not suffered to rust in idleness; every faculty was sharpened, and pride and emulation united with a sense of duty in making these watchmen alert on their posts.

Yet, sir, it was at this time, and by these men, under such circumstances, that the practical construction to which I now return, was established.

The Constitution gives to Congress "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." This was among the first powers that came to be exercised by this Government. The regulation of three kinds of commerce was given to it: foreign commerce, commerce between the States, and commerce with the Indian tribes. It is obvious, that no more power is given in relation to any one of them, than to the other two. If regulate means only (in its strictest sense,) to restrain by laws or rules, in the one, it must have the same meaning as to the others. If, on the contrary, as to any one, it may signify not only such restriction, but also a general superintendence, extending to every species of legislation necessary for the subject, then the same liberal construction must be extended to the others—because, neither in the clause nor the context, is there found the slightest distinction. The inquiry then, now is, whether a practical construction has been put on any of the three powers given by this clause.

The subject that most pressed on the attention of Congress, in its early sessions, was the regulation of foreign commerce. If they had considered the power as confined to regulation, in the strict sense now contended for, they would have confined themselves to the passage of laws declaring in what manner the revenue arising from it should be collected, in what ships it should be carried on, and to what ports, and from what countries, without daring to do any thing that was merely calculated to facilitate or extend it. But, the very reverse was the fact—one of the first acts passed, I think in the first session, and annually renewed for some time after, was one taking charge of all the buoys, beacons, lighthouses, and piers, which had been established by the States. Now, sir, if regulate does not extend beyond the restriction by rules, as gentlemen now tell us, if it cannot, without a violation of the Constitution, be extended, so as to embrace the idea of promoting and protecting, by what authority were these acts passed? What were the Madisons and Gallatins, and the Gileses, and the other faithful guardians of the Constitution, then doing? Were they asleep on their posts, when this daring inroad was made on the State rights? What! suffer the State lighthouses, the State piers, the State buoys, and the State beacons, to be taken by the General Government, without a word, when they had no other power than they could derive under the word regulate? No, sir; they were not negligent of their duty. If they could have imagined that a doubt could have been entertained as to the rightful exercise of the power, depend on it, that doubt would have been raised. The party, sir, was not without its minute philosophers. We had our etymologists and philologists—ay, sir, our hair splitters, and measurers of syllables, as well as other assemblies—and, if it could have occurred to them, that the States would be ruined by saving them the expense of these establishments, or that the power was doubtful, be assured that not a letter composing the word regulate would have escaped examination. It would have been traced to its root, and the verb regulo would have been danced through all its moods and tenses, to show that its signification was to restrain, not to promote or facilitate. Then our logicians would have taken up the argument, and said, We have only a power, (as has been demonstrated by the philologists,) to restrain. But, lighthouses and piers facilitate. To facilitate is not to restrain—therefore, we have no right to build lighthouses, which was to be demonstrated. But, sir, not one word of all this fine learning and research was heard. The grammarians and the word-mongers and the Constitutional watchmen and the guardians of State rights, were silent—and the buoys and piers and lighthouses were taken under the protection of the United States without a single negative. The measure passed with as little ceremony or opposition as a motion does here to adjourn at four o'clock! It not only passed once, but was yearly repeated, and always without exciting any doubts or fears. It passed, not only with respect to the first object of the clause, foreign commerce, but in a more striking degree, as respects the last, the trade with the Indian tribes. This has undergone every degree of legislation of which the subject was capable, and always, it is believed, without any fears of infringing the Constitution.

Now, sir, this brings us to the dilemma of declaring all this uniform course of legislation, from the establishment of the Constitution to the present time, our own acts and those of our predecessors, to be unconstitutional and void; for not a session has passed, nor will this pass, without providing for those very piers, lighthouses, and beacons. We must, I say, declare every Congress, every President, since the first institution of the Government, including ourselves, to have been guilty of deliberate annual breaches of the Constitution; or we must decide that we have the power contemplated by this bill. For the power in relation to foreign commerce is the same as that given in relation to commerce between the States. It is contained in the same sentence, and the same verb governs both members of the phrase. If, then, this phrase gives the power to facilitate foreign commerce by building piers and seawalls, why does it not equally give the right of facilitating and promoting commerce between the States, by cutting canals? If even a colorable answer can be given to this question, I abandon the measure. But, although put cursorily in the debate, by the honorable Speaker, I have heard no distinction attempted. We have, indeed, been told, that the establishments for foreign commerce are on the seaboard. This is not always the fact. The piers of the Delaware are within the body of the State—part of some county. So, indeed, are all these buildings. But, if it were true, what is the consequence? The locality does not alter the right; and, if strictly examined, it will be found that many of these establishments are in places in which they are principally useful for the trade between the States, and, in some, where there is no foreign commerce, as the lighthouse on Lake Pontchartrain, and others that might be named. The power, then, has been exercised in favor of the internal State commerce; as well as the foreign.

I rely more on this practical construction, because a majority of the phalanx of great names I have enumerated, and who sanctioned it by their silence, were from Virginia. Virginia! then, as she is now, the bulwark of State rights. Virginia! then, as she is now, represented by some of the highest abilities. Virginia! always foremost in defence of the Constitution. And I say those precedents cannot be wrong—that construction cannot be false—which were made by the distinguished Representatives of that distinguished State.

But it is objected that this power cannot have been intended to have passed to the General Government, because, in its exercise, it is liable to the greatest abuse. What! say gentlemen, shall the United States have power to take away my land for a road, or divert the water from my mill, for a canal? Shall they have power to seize on the State works, empty the feeders of State canals, drain off Lake Drummond, and change the course of the Roanoke? The answer to this has been given. They have power to do nothing but that which is necessary and proper for the end. These acts would be unnecessary and improper; therefore, they have no right to do them. But the power as to foreign commerce is equally extensive, equally liable to abuse. They have no more right to take land for canals than they have to take it for light-houses; yet, whenever land for that purpose has been wanted, they have purchased it. If, then, the laws protect us against encroachment on the seaboard, why should we doubt their efficacy in the interior? All powers are liable to abuse. Most of those vested in Congress are so in a much greater degree than this. The power of taxation may leave nothing to support the State governments. The acknowledged power over foreign commerce may be so exercised as to produce the greatest oppression. It can never, then, be made the objection to the constitutionality of a measure to say that it is liable to abuse.

We are asked, sir, if these powers were intended to be given, why were they not clearly expressed? Why was it not said, in so many words, Congress shall have power to make roads and canals? The answer is easy. It is a characteristic of the Constitution that it deals in general expressions, and avoids details as much as possible, for the plain reason that all cases could not be expressed, and that the expression of one might be argued into an exclusion of another power equally intended to pass by the general words; as in the present case, if the power had been expressly added to the clause of making canals to facilitate commerce, and hereafter some improvement, such as railways or inclined planes, should be found more convenient, the power to make them might be doubted, on account of the express power given to make canals. But I think it has been sufficiently shown, that, without recourse to implication, the grant of all these powers is sufficiently established.

We are next told, that the point, being at least doubtful, we must resort to contemporaneous exposition; and we are, as usual, referred to the numbers of the Federalist, and to the debates of the Convention. The reasons for receiving these commentaries with some allowance have been already stated; but, in the present instance, the passage of the Federalist so often quoted may with as much propriety be construed to mean that the roads and canals of which he speaks are to be the work as well of the General Government as of the States; and as to debates, we find that in the New York Convention at least, the power we contend for supposed to be given; for an amendment was expressly proposed, and rejected, for its limitation. But we deny the premises of this objection. The text, we contend, is express, and the commentaries are introduced to make it doubtful.

After one or two other objections, the answers to which have been anticipated, we are told that Mr. Jefferson recommended an amendment to the Constitution, in order to obtain the powers in question, and that both Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe have rejected bills passed for that purpose, because they supposed them unconstitutional.

[To show the first circumstance incorrectly stated, Mr. LIVINGSTON read the Message of Mr. Jefferson.] It appears, he said, from this, that the great statesman whose authority is relied on, and certainly none is entitled to more respect, recommended several objects of internal improvement, among which were roads and canals, and others not within any of the powers granted to Congress, such as a national system of education, and he only recommends an amendment to embrace such of the powers as are not vested in Congress—most clearly indicating that the others, to wit, the roads and canals, were. It is true, that the two next Presidents, Mr. Madison and Mr. Monroe, did return bills on this subject, but these bills contained, each of them, provisions different from this. And from the language of Mr. Madison's previous Message, we must conclude that these details, not the principles assumed by the bill now before us, were the reason of his objection; for he, in that Message says: "And I particularly invite again their attention [of Congress] to the expediency of exercising their existing powers, and, where necessary, of resorting to the prescribed mode of enlarging them, in order to effectuate a comprehensive system of roads and canals, such as will have the effect of drawing more closely together every part of our country, by promoting intercourse and improvements, and by increasing the share of every part in the common stock of national prosperity."

And Mr. Monroe clearly admits the power, though he does not derive it from the same source that most of its other advocates have relied on. But give the objection its most extensive interpretation; if it should prove that two Presidents have thought the measure unwarranted by any express power, it also proves that large majorities in both branches of the Legislature have, whenever it was submitted to them, entertained a different opinion, and, as far as Executive authority goes, we have its unequivocal opinion of the expediency of the measure.

But, it is repeated, this is a local measure, originating in local views, and will be executed for the benefit of a part of the Union only.

It seems hardly just or reasonable thus to characterize a measure recommended by three successive Presidents, during a period of more than twenty years, and acted upon by several successive Legislatures; and, whatever may be the private views of any of those who support it, those views can form no just ground of opposition, if the measure be in itself good. If what is meant be, that it is intended, and will operate exclusively for the benefit of certain parts of the Union, without resulting in any good to the whole, I answer, this must depend on the manner in which the power shall be directed to be executed by a subsequent bill; that all local views, if any should then suggest inexpedient works, will be defeated by the wisdom of our successors; that this would be an abuse of power, and that the possibility of such abuse is no argument against its existence. Besides, sir, how can this argument be reconciled to that which supposes the exercise of this power within any State so ruinous as almost to justify resistance? But, if the argument consist in asserting that the execution of the contemplated works must produce a greater advantage to the places in their vicinity than to others more remote, the assertion is undoubtedly true; but every legislative act, without exception, is unequal in the benefits or inconvenience of its operation, and we must cease to legislate if the power can be legally exercised only by preserving a perfect equality in the distribution of the good and evil of legislation. We must have no ports of entry because of the advantage the proprietors of stores and houses, situated there, will derive from it. No seat of government, no county towns, must be established by the different States. No public buildings must be erected, because the lands in their vicinity, will be augmented in value. No officers must be appointed, because of the advantage they derive from their salaries.

Leaving the Constitutional objections, those who oppose the bill are the most vehement when they approach the question of expediency. If one tenth part of the evils they predict could reasonably be apprehended, we ought not (although convinced of the power) to exercise it. Tyranny, oppression, seizure of private property, annihilation of State rights, breach of the Union, ruin and desolation to the whole empire; these are denounced to us in all the vehemence of irresistible elocution as the inevitable consequences of the measure we propose. But, though frequently urged, the means by which these dreadful predictions are to be accomplished are not revealed. Oracular language has always been obscure; and we are left to conjecture how a measure, of all others the least calculated to excite alarm, the least liable to abuse in its execution, and inevitably accompanied by the greatest local advantages to the States into which it must be carried into effect, should provoke the jealousy, or cause the ruin of those States; how the promotion of commerce between the different members of the Union, providing for the daily social intercourse of their inhabitants, establishing effectual means for their common defence, and binding them in the chain of mutual benefits, can cause their separation. Some, indeed, have lifted a corner of the veil, and given two distinct theories, on the establishment of which they found (I confess I cannot comprehend in what manner) the accomplishment of these awful results.

First, we are told that the latent vice of the Constitution, the fatal disease under which it must finally fall, is an excess of power given to the General Government, enabling it to encroach on those of the States, and annihilate them in consolidation.

This is a revival of the old bugbear that frightened us in our political infancy. It was the prediction of the anti-federalists who opposed the political union of the States under our present happy Government, as it is now of those who oppose their commercial, social, and defensive union under the means now proposed. Forty years have elapsed without the most remote indication that the first prophecy was about to be accomplished; and I trust, sir, that thousands of years will roll on in prosperity and union without fulfilling the second.

I entertain the greatest respect for the opinions of those who entertain those fears; but I cannot participate in them. Unless I am greatly mistaken, they arise from a false conception of the nature of our Government, from a want of due attention to its structure and component parts. Were the powers of the Constitution vested in a single man or in a permanent body, there would be good reason for the apprehension.

But, who is it that we, as representatives of the people, believe will encroach on the liberties of the people? We, ourselves. We, the representatives of the people. Who do we fear will join us in overturning the governments of the States? The representatives of those very States; the guardians of their sovereignty. Who is to sanction those invasions of private liberty and State sovereignty? The man elected by the States, and by the people, who, by a happy combination of both powers, derives his political existence from both. No form of Government could have been devised more happily framed to allay the fears of those who, justly attached to their local authorities, wished to preserve them against encroachment. The people individually represented in one branch by men who, at stated and very short intervals, return to the mass of the people; the State sovereignties occupying exclusively a second branch, with equal powers; a qualified power of rejecting all their acts, and full executive power vested in a man chosen under the direction of the State sovereignties, and those sovereignties left in the full exercise of their power. If all this does not form a barrier against any invasion of State rights, there is no security in Constitutional provisions, and it is in vain to make any compact to restrain the exercise of power. I acknowledge, sir, that the most express organic stipulation may prove a weak barrier against interest or ambition, where no countervailing interest or other strong motive is proposed to check their operation. Here neither interest nor ambition can be tempted to produce the effect that is apprehended; and, if they could, effectual means are provided to check any enterprise of that nature that could be formed.

What is the particular fear? That the Government of the United States, consisting of the House of Representatives, the Senate, and the President, should use the powers given them, and usurp others not given, for the purpose of weakening first, and finally destroying, the State sovereignties, and merging them in one consolidated government. This is supposed to be not only a feasible object, but the natural tendency of the Government; the disease of which, in its present form, it is doomed to die; and that all our attention is required to retard the fatal event. That every exertion of power is to be considered as a dangerous symptom, and to be repressed, as we value our political existence.

First. Is it possible that we can desire this change; that our interest or ambition could, in any event, be gratified by producing it? This change, remember, is the preservation of this Government, and the prostration of that of the States. But, if the State governments go, this must go with them. We move, and breathe, and have our being, only by means of the State governments. Destroy them, and we destroy ourselves. A complete revolution must now follow. Therefore, neither our interest nor ambition could be gratified by doing that which it is said to be our natural tendency to do. All illegal changes in government, that are not produced by violence, must be made by the members of that government itself. But, can any change be apprehended from that source, when neither the interest nor the ambition of the members will be gratified in producing it? An entire dissolution of the Federal, as well as the State Governments, might tempt the rapacity of a Catiline, or the ambition of a Cæsar. But that is not the evil apprehended. It is the aggrandizement of this Government, not its annihilation; it is its existence with inordinate powers, not its destruction, that is feared. And the argument is, that, preserving the present forms, the representatives of the people will find it their interest to betray the liberties of the people, among whom they are to be mingled every two years; and the Senators to destroy the State sovereignties, by which alone they exist. This biennial election, sir, is a dreadful objection to the supposition that we should indulge this scheme. We must go home, sir. What good will our encroachments on the State rights do us then? We must become a part of that people whose rights we have betrayed. What interest can be served by this? But we will not go home. We will declare our sittings permanent, and give a second edition of the Long Parliament! This notable scheme, depend on it, will never have a proposer or an advocate. Means, and effectual means, would soon be found, and we know it, to send us home; ay, sir, to our long home! where we should receive the reward of our folly and treason.

But admit that we were base, and unprincipled, and blind enough to desire this change—how are we to effect it? In the natural course of things, the attack on State rights must originate in this House; it can hardly be apprehended in the Senate. But we, the representatives of the people, conspire against the State rights, so deservedly dear to the people. Without any motive of interest, or hope of gratification, we resolve on measures that are to destroy them. This is not enough—the Senate must concur. It is not sufficient that we lose our senses—the Senators must part with theirs. And, when this is effected, nothing is done until the President sanctions our mad resolves. And even then, if such a state of things can be supposed, the difficulties are but begun. We would have the resistance—the just, energetic, and effectual resistance, of twenty-four well organized governments, possessing (as I trust they will always possess) the attachment of the people, to overwhelm us and our unholy and senseless projects, in the ruin we should deserve.

In whatsoever light, then, we consider this apprehension of encroachment from the General Government, it seems extraordinary that it should be entertained, when it wants the motives of private interest or personal ambition to suggest it; or, even if they should exist, when its utter impracticability, to any extent, must discourage even rashness itself from attempting it. No, sir; the danger, if any, may be presumed with more truth, by those who love to prophesy evil, in the separation of the States. This event, so greatly to be deprecated, might not want specious arguments to support its probability—if proper means are not resorted to for preserving their union. Make it the interest of each State to be united to the rest. Connect them by the ties of commerce; facilitate the means of that epistolary correspondence which preserves the bonds of kindred, of friendship, and acquaintance, between the emigrant to the West, and the connexions he has left in the Atlantic States. Assure them of prompt and efficacious aid against aggression, by means of military ways. In short, pass the bill on your table, and follow it by the establishment of a wise, extensive, and effectual system for effecting the purposes it contemplates. Every post route you establish, every road you make, every canal you dig, will be a new ligament to bind the Union, by the easiest, the most natural, and, therefore, the most effectual bonds—those of mutual interest, social intercourse, common defence.

So far is this from being a local measure, that not a part of the nation, however remote, but must participate in its benefits. And it would be difficult to determine, or even to conjecture, whether the Western or the Atlantic States would most benefit by a system of roads and canals, connecting the waters of the one with those of the other. Certain it is, that the advantage to both, would be incalculable. If the one found a ready market for their produce, the other would derive equal or superior benefit by the augmented demand for foreign produce or domestic manufacture. The shipping of the most remote ports would find increased employment; the most distant manufactories of the Union would feel its effect, in the number of new consumers for their wares, and the triple sources of national wealth; agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, would feel its vivifying effects, in all their ramifications.

Another theory has been offered by a gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. STEVENSON,) somewhat, I think, at war with the last, but not, in my opinion, more applicable. We are told, that attachment to the General Government, like the solar heat, decreases in proportion to the distance from the centre. If so, I should like to know—as a Representative of the most distant State, I am interested in knowing—by what rule of proportion the attachment of my constituents to the Union is to be calculated. Is it in direct proportion, or as the squares of the distances? Arithmetical, or geometrical proportion? If this new rule of political physiology be correct, we may calculate to a fraction what reliance we can place on the exertions and zeal of any given State.

According to this system, the District of Columbia, under the direct rays of the Government, in the full blaze of its influence, ought to be the most remarkable for patriotism, love of the Union, shown by heroic deeds in its defence. Virginia and Maryland would be warmed in a somewhat less degree by this holy fire. It would diminish as we pass the mountains—be feebly felt in Kentucky and Tennessee—and, in my unhappy, distant State, its vivifying fire would be lost in languid apathy and frigid indifference. The freezing point of patriotism would be on the banks of the Mississippi, and its fever heat on the Potomac.

Metaphors, sir, are dangerous things in argument. Dazzled by their splendor, we frequently lose sight of the subject we mean to illustrate, and attribute to it properties that are only found in the object to which it is compared. The rule is neither true in theory, as applied to us, nor is it verified by fact.

In countries where the will of the Monarch is law, where all authority is derived from him, and where distance obliges him to delegate it, it may be true; and a disposition to throw off responsibility and assert independence, may be, in such countries, greater in proportion to the distance, because the danger of suppression is less. Despotism is always submitted to with reluctance; and, as distance gives greater facility to throw it off, there is a tendency in the remote provinces of an oppressive Government to revolt; not because the attachment to it is greater near the centre, but because the danger near the extremities is less.

But we cannot apply these considerations to our Government, without losing sight of its construction and its principle. We are not bound together by fear, but by patriotism; by which, as used here, I understand, that love of country which arises from a deep persuasion that the interest of each part is inseparable from the good of the whole, and that that good can only be found in the union of the States. It has its foundation in a wise, liberal, and enlarged sentiment of self interest—but is capable, when exerted, of rising to enthusiasm—postponing the end to the means; forgetting personal and local interests, and making those patriotic sacrifices and exertions which command the admiration of the world.

No State will have a tendency to separate from the others, so long as it is not blind to its true interest. But, if this be the principle on which the Union is founded, that species of interest on which it rests ought to be fostered by such measures as those now proposed. The best affections, the tenderest connexions, the most endearing recollections of life, unite many of those who are now locally separated in distant States—are not these ties worth preserving, in a political as well as a moral view? Nothing can do this more effectually than facility of communication. Connexions that would be forgotten, in one generation, with the rugged roads of the Alleghany between them, will be kept up for ages, when steamboats and canals, and stages, on smooth turnpikes, make a visit easy, or the transmission of a letter as certain, and almost as speedy, as it formerly was to a neighboring town. Add to these interest, in its more palpable forms of commerce and defence, and that tendency to dissolution, which is apprehended, will be completely counteracted, if it exists. The construction, too, of our Government, as well as its principle, ought to banish our fears on this subject. Its federative character, which Montesquieu extols, as an affectual means of enabling a republic to extend its dominion, without weakening its power, is a security on which we may safely rely. And while all local concerns are intrusted to local authorities, chosen by the people, and the general political interests of the nation are committed to the Government of the whole, there can be no natural tendency, in any State, however remote, to shake off an authority that is only felt by the security and prosperity it affords.

There is no truth, then, in the principle laid down as theoretically applied to our Confederation. Has experience shown it to be well founded? Sir, the experiment has been tried, and the result is one to which, for my constituents, I can refer to with an honest pride. The enemy, at the period to which I allude, seemed to act on the theory of the gentleman from Virginia, they directed an overwhelming force against the extremity, the utmost extremity, of the Union, where other circumstances, as well as distance, led them to hope submission or feeble resistance. What did they find? Men indifferent to their rights? Lukewarm in their love of country? Willing to barter honor for safety, and independence for property? No, sir; they met freemen, proud of the title they had lately acquired, and determined to show how highly they prized it, by their exertions in defence of the country by which it was conferred. They found courage, conscious of the danger, and eager to face it; they found an ardent enthusiasm for liberty, contrasted by a cool determination to defend it against odds that would have made prudent patriots quail; determined to conquer or die, they never lost a thought on the disparity of their own numbers, and did not stop to inquire those of their enemy until they counted them stretched on the field. Yes, sir, in that field, drenched with the blood, strewn with the bodies of our invaders, where the valor and discipline of twelve thousand veterans was baffled and discomfited by the firmness and steady courage of less than one-third of their number—in that glorious field, the courage and patriotism of my constituents inscribed on the page of history a splendid refutation of the principle that is advanced. But they were not alone. No, sir, they were not alone; but who were at their sides? Who braved the danger, underwent the fatigue, and shared the honor of the defence? Who, with the cheerfulness of guests invited to a feast, voluntarily came to partake with us the chance of exulting in victory, or the more probable event of sharing with us an honorable grave? Men, probably, from those favored States where the sun of patriotism ever shines unclouded by interest, indifference, or fear! No, sir; whatever might be their desire to defend us, they came not; and the want of those means which this bill is intended to provide, prevented them from sending us arms, ammunition, or other necessary supplies. Who, then, were they—these brave and generous defenders? Why, truly, sir, they were men from Kentucky, Mississippi, Tennessee—from those parts where, by this degrading theory, love of country grows languid, and patriotism expires; and, as if this example was designed, in all its parts, to run counter to the argument, the master spirit who directed the operations that led to these decisive results—he, too, came from those regions remote from the central fire. I might go on, and inquire whether the other point of the rule was better proved here, in the very focus of patriotic heat? When these walls were wrapt in flames, surely not kindled by that sacred fire! and when a neighboring town escaped a similar conflagration, not by the arms of brave citizens who defended it, but by the supplications of deputies, who laid its wealth at the feet of their invaders. I shall not press this part of the argument, and if I allude to it at all, it is not in the spirit of invidious comparison, which I utterly disclaim, but because a sacred duty to my constituents requires that I should show, in all its parts, the fallacy of a theory that would subject them to the imputation of wanting attachment to the Union they have so well defended, and deprive them of honors they have nobly won. Away, then, with these fancies, that tend only to excite jealousies and mutual reproach, and that do not belong to the subject before us. To that I return, in order to dispose of some objections that have been made to the expediency of the measure. It will increase Executive patronage, by the appointment of a host of new officers. This is much exaggerated by supposing the object to be the support of all the post roads in the Union: that is disclaimed; it is only such new roads as are necessary, and that will not be made by the States. If these require officers, they must be appointed; and if we fear the influence of the President, we may vest the appointments elsewhere.

If this argument were conclusive, we should have neither army nor navy, nor any other useful institution. Government will be imposed on if they perform works by contract. They have been imposed on, it is said, in building a fortification at New York. If this argument is good, we ought to build no forts—construct no works—and deprive ourselves of all defence, for fear of losing money in our contracts.

To these objections a gentleman from New York has added an apprehension that the United States would seize on their canal. Sir, I might as well fear they would seize on the Mississippi. Neither the bill, nor the largest construction of the power, gives them any such right.

Yet, sir, it is on improbabilities such as these, that the most gloomy apprehensions are raised. Virginia seems particularly to entertain them, and it has been strongly intimated, that, if this measure is carried, she will regret that she has yielded the purse and the sword. Virginia will regret that she has made a part of the nation! I cannot, sir, but believe these intimations to proceed rather from the excitement of debate, operating on warm and generous minds, than from any settled opinion. No, I will never believe that a State which has always held so distinguished a place in the councils and administration of the Union, can, even for a moment, regret the event that led to the proud pre-eminence she has enjoyed, and still enjoys. She must remember, that, out of thirty-six years, which will soon be completed, thirty-two of them will have seen citizens of that State administering the Executive power of the Union, by the free choice, sometimes by the unanimous choice of the whole nation. She can never regret her forming a part of that closer federation of the States, which gave to her and our WASHINGTON a new title to the gratitude of his country, and the admiration of the world; which added the civic to his military crown, made him the founder of our strength, and union, and peace, and happiness, as he had before been of our Independence; and enabled him, by his second retirement, to complete that perfect character which makes his name, in all languages, synonymous with every paraphrase that can express the union of virtues and qualities never found but in him; which forms at once the hero, the statesman, and the patriot. No! that great name should never be profaned by a wish that would destroy any one of the numerous titles it has to the reverence of his country; the Union, formed under his auspices, cannot be dissolved without an outrage to his memory; and even the unguarded expression that conveys an idea that any event may make it desirable, must diminish the lustre reflected by his reputation, on the State that gave him birth.

Virginia cannot, does not, forget, that, unless she had formed a member of the Union, the Sage who gave language and voice and utterance to our Independence, would have lived only to lament the inefficiency of that decisive act; to witness the weakness, discord, and distress of his country—perhaps its utter ruin, and fall from that station among the Powers of the earth, which his immortal declaration had proclaimed. His days would have been passed in endeavors, perhaps unavailing endeavors, to restore harmony and reconcile the jarring interests of the States. His valuable life would have been abridged by the deep chagrin of disappointment, and have closed, amid scenes of tumult and disorder. Instead of this, by the happiest and most honorable of contrasts, he has had the supreme satisfaction of fostering that Independence which he had announced to the admiring world; of seeing it established and respected by an indissoluble bond, formed by apparent concession, but really founded on the most perfect reciprocity of benefits, mutually conferred, and mutually received—of promoting, by important services, both abroad and at home, the reputation and interest of his country, of directing, in the first office it could bestow, the rapid approach to those high destinies to which it is called; of receiving, in the esteem and affection of a happy and united people, the best reward they could bestow; and of passing, in dignified ease and philosophic retirement, in pleasing recollections of the past, and a happy anticipation of the future—the calm evening of a long life, spent in promoting the happiness of his country.

Sir, if we want another occasion to remind this highly favored State, this nursery of great men, that she, of all others, has reason to rejoice in the establishment of the Union, and pride herself on its effects, we need only look to a neighboring retreat, and almost under the trees that shade the Sage of Monticello, where Madison, in the society of his illustrious friend, and in the consciousness of a pure life, unblemished even in the violence of party by imputation of a deviation from duty, hears, with calmness and moderation, the undivided voice of his countrymen, bearing testimony not only to his wisdom and virtue, but to that decisive spirit which roused us from submission to foreign insult and injury, taught us to respect ourselves, bade our little Navy ride triumphant on the sea, and our citizen soldiers to defeat veteran valor in the field; established our national character; and, by an honorable peace, enabled his successor to proceed in the great work he had successfully begun, of making us respected abroad and happy at home. That successor is also a son of Virginia; that his Administration is one that affords another reason to his native State for felicitating herself on having given him to the unanimous suffrages of the Union, it does not become me to say, because the time has not yet arrived, when even that which truth will sanction, may be spoken without the imputation of an unworthy motive.

These men, their reputation, their virtues, belong to us all—they are the property of the nation. But, would the State which gave them birth, if it were possible—would she surrender her particular part in this property?—in the gratitude that is due for their services?—in the honor they have acquired for their country—in the reverence with which their names will be held by posterity? No, sir; no consideration of minor interest, much less the fear of uncertain evil, would induce her to forego this proud distinction of her citizens—this glorious heritage for their children.

The bill before us may pass—I trust, will pass—and I am persuaded that its operation will show how vain have been the fears, how false the predictions of its effect.

When Mr. LIVINGSTON had concluded—

The question being put, on the motion of Mr. BARBOUR, to strike out the enacting clause, it was decided in the negative—ayes 84, noes 108.

The question on rising and reporting the bill without amendment being about to be put, Mr. WICKLIFFE proposed to amend the bill, by striking out the words "thirty thousand dollars" and inserting "fifteen thousand dollars," (as the sum appropriated for obtaining the plans and surveys.) This motion was supported by the mover, on the ground of economy, opposed by Mr. TRIMBLE, as unnecessary, (any unexpended balance returning of course to the surplus fund of the Treasury,) and discreditable to the country on account of its small amount. Mr. MALLARY supported the motion, believing the sum sufficient.

The question being put, the amendment was rejected—ayes 85, noes 91.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 10.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Celestin Moreau, of Louisiana," reported the same without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to which was also referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act confirming the heirs of Nicholas Baudin, and the heirs of Joseph Chastang, to certain tracts of land," reported, as the opinion of the committee, that the said bill ought not to pass. The bill was laid on the table.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill to define the boundary line between the Edwardsville and Springfield land districts, in the State of Illinois; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of Johanna Collins, for a divorce, reported that, in the opinion of the committee, the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted; which report was concurred in by the House.

The Committee for the District of Columbia were discharged from the consideration of the resolution of the General Assembly of Ohio, upon the subject of an entire abolition of slavery; and it was laid on the table.

Mr. RANKIN laid the following resolution on the table for consideration on to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House if the line intended to constitute the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas has been run, in conformity with the provisions of the third section of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1823, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1823, and for other purposes;" and, if said line has not been run, that he inform this House what instructions have been given, or measures adopted, in relation to the execution of that provision of the law, and what causes have prevented said line from being run.

Mr. OWEN laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration on to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to state to this House what practical construction has been given by the several registers and receivers, respectively, on the act of 1820, for the relief of purchasers of public lands; and the instructions given them relative to said act, with regard to fees or compensation, and whether, in his opinion, by a correct construction, the fees or compensation was adequate to the service, and whether, by the construction given in any case, the compensation was greater than was contemplated by law, and more than adequate to the service performed.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, gave notice that he would, to-morrow, move the House for leave to introduce a bill directing the payment of the Georgia militia claims for services rendered during the years 1792, 1793, and 1794.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the confirmation of the land claims recommended for confirmation by the report of the commissioners for the western land district of Louisiana, made upon the 30th of December, 1815, in virtue of the several acts of Congress, passed upon the 10th of March, 1812, the 27th February, 1813, and 12th April, 1814.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of empowering the register of the land office at Opelousas, in Louisiana, to make and complete the report of certain land claims which were entered under the act of the 11th of May, 1820, and which the late register had neglected to do, and that a reasonable compensation be allowed to the present register for doing the same.

On motion of Mr. WICKLIFFE, it was

Resolved, That the Message of the President, of the 22d of January, 1823, with the accompanying documents, relative to the navigation of the rivers Ohio and Mississippi, be referred to a select committee, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

MESSRS. WICKLIFFE, FORWARD, JENNINGS, GAZLAY, WEBSTER, DURFEE, and RIVES, were appointed said committee.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to Thomas Alsbury, captain of a company in the mounted expedition under General Samuel Hopkins, in the year 1812, for a mare lost on said expedition, in consequence of a wound accidentally received, whilst she was in actual service.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to William Grace, a soldier who served under General Samuel Hopkins in the mounted expedition in 1812, for a horse which was shot during said campaign, whilst in actual service.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to John Milholland, who served as a sergeant in a company of mounted volunteers in the Fall of 1813, on the expedition commanded by Governor Shelby, for a horse lost by him on said campaign, whilst in actual service of the United States.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing compensation to John Golliver, a private in a company of mounted volunteers in the expedition under Governor Shelby in 1813, for a horse lost by him on said expedition, whilst in the actual service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, it was Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Hagen's store, in the county of Preston, in Virginia, to Smithfield, on the Cumberland road: and also of discontinuing the present route from the above-mentioned store to Morgantown, in the county of Monongalia.

Ordered, That the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by sundry statements in relation to allowances made to registers and receivers of land offices, for clerk hire, office rent, &c., laid before the House of Representatives on the 3d of March, 1823, be referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. RANKIN communicated to the House a letter to the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands from the Secretary of the Treasury, dated 3d March, 1823, containing information in relation to allowances to registers and receivers of land offices for extra clerk hire, &c., which letter was also referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to revive, and continue in force an act entitled 'An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives; of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian,'" was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Accounts.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SURVEYS FOR ROADS AND CANALS.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of the Whole, on the bill to obtain the necessary plans, estimates, &c., in relation to roads and canals.

Mr. FLOYD moved to strike out the enacting clause of the bill—but, at the suggestion of Mr. RANDOLPH, withdrew the motion; and

Mr. RANDOLPH moved that the consideration of the bill be indefinitely postponed; and, on his motion, the ayes and noes were ordered to be taken upon it.

Before the question was taken, however,

Mr. SAUNDERS moved that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Roads and Canals, with instructions "to designate such roads and canals of a national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail, as may be deemed proper and expedient to have surveyed and reported upon."

Mr. FORSYTH suggested to the mover of the instructions to strike out that clause of them which relates to post roads.

Mr. SAUNDERS did not accept the modification.

Mr. RICH then moved the previous question; which motion was not sustained by the House.

And the question being on recommitment—

Mr. Cook made a few observations.

The question was then put on the motion of Mr. SAUNDERS, to recommit the bill with instructions, and the yeas and nays stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. The question recurring on Mr. RANDOLPH'S motion for indefinite postponement—

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, observed, that he had listened with attention, and with much satisfaction, to the very able discussion of this interesting subject, which had occupied the attention of the Committee of the Whole for many days; a subject of deep interest to the country, as well on account of the magnitude of the object, as the importance of coming to a correct conclusion on the Constitutional power of Congress in relation to it; and the result had been, on his mind, a thorough conviction that Congress did not possess the power, by the Constitution, to engage in a system of internal improvements, as contemplated by this bill. And, in addition to this, that, even if Congress did possess the power, it was not expedient, at this time, to attempt to exercise it.

And, although he was sensible that, after the long and very able discussion of the question, the House was prepared to act upon it, and he could not expect, by any effort of his, to change the opinion which had been deliberately formed—yet he felt it to be his duty to enter his protest against the principles which had been advanced by the advocates of the bill. And he trusted that the courtesy of the House would permit him to occupy its attention for a few minutes, in explaining his views on the subject, which his situation in committee had prevented.

Sir, said Mr. F., the principles contended for by the advocates of this bill, in my opinion, are calculated to excite serious alarm; the power which many gentlemen had claimed, and which some have declared "they will not surrender," transcends the power claimed by a majority of the Congress during the dark days of '98-9: and involves the right of an extension of the power of Congress, even to the omnipotence of a British Parliament. Our system of government presents an anomaly—it is a confederation of independent governments—it bears no analogy to any other system, and gentlemen, in my humble opinion, fall into gross errors by any attempts to find analogy with any other Government. By some, it is contended, "this power must reside somewhere; the people have surrendered it;" and they assume this position, that "the State governments do not possess it; and, of course, it must be in Congress." Sir, the whole power of Congress is given by your Constitution; from what other source can you derive it? It is created by the Constitution. The error of gentlemen appears to be, in the application of the same rule of construction to the Constitution of the United States, as is justly applied to the State constitutions. Here, sir, the analogy fails, and the position "that the power must reside somewhere," is wholly inapplicable to the Constitution of the United States. The position is, in itself, undoubtedly true, in part; but the conclusion does not follow. It is undoubtedly true, that, if the power is not in the people, it is in the State governments; and you will find it so admitted: for the power to construct roads and canals has been in constant exercise in every State in the Union. The grand distinction between the constitutions of the State governments and of the United States, is this—the State constitutions limit and define power—the Constitution of the United States grants power. Where, then, is the analogy between them? The constructive power of Congress is denied.

If my view of the Constitution of the United States be correct, it must be admitted, that unless the Constitution of the United States has expressly given Congress the power to construct roads and canals, you do not possess this power, nor can you pass this bill, without violating the rights of the State governments. Indeed, this seems, in some degree, to be admitted: for the advocates agree in this, that the power must be executed either by express delegation or by necessary implication.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Surveys for Roads and Canals.

H. OF R.

And, sir, where do they find it? One gentleman, (Mr. CLAY,) is fully persuaded, that it is contained in the power to establish post offices and post roads. Another, (Mr. McLANE, of Delaware,) disclaims this ground entirely; but, sees it clearly in the power to regulate commerce. Another, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) rejects this as altogether untenable; but discovers it, as clear as the noon day's sun, in the power to declare war, and the general sweeping phrase, all powers necessary and proper for carrying the foregoing powers into effect. It is unnecessary to pursue this further. If the power is given, why do not gentlemen agree in what part of the Constitution it is to be found? Sir, this single circumstance convinces me that the power is not granted. One position assumed by the advocates of this bill, is entitled to particular notice; it is the assumption that the power "to lay and collect taxes," gives to Congress the "right of appropriating the money so collected, to any purpose whatever." This may properly be termed the involution of power. That one power can create another, and a greater power, is a principle entirely novel and extraordinary; and if it be correct, the single power vested by the Constitution in Congress to "lay and collect taxes," vests in Congress a power so absolute, that any other power granted by the Constitution, was entirely unnecessary, and every other part of the Constitution must be superfluous! Strange as this must (in my view) appear, it has been contended by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. McDUFFIE,) that the powers of Congress, "in 'promoting the general welfare, are only limited' by its own discretion, and the responsibility of 'members to their constituents, at the elections.'"

If this principle be correct, to what conclusion does it lead? Most certainly this: that the power of Congress is absolute and despotic, and the Constitution a dead letter; and if the rights of the State governments are prostrated, and the dearest interests of the people most wantonly sacrificed, and your Treasury beggared, you find an ample remedy in dismissing your worthy agents! Sir, in my opinion, the people would feel greater security in knowing that unconstitutional acts are void, than in the belief that they are merely voidable.

But, sir, supposing a bare majority believe you do possess the power, can it be expedient to exercise it? It is well known that, if not a majority, at least a very respectable minority, and composed of men of no ordinary talents and experience, sincerely believe Congress do not possess this power. Will you persist in the attempt to exercise a doubtful power? The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. LIVINGSTON) has, with his usual candor, declared that, "if he considered the power as at all doubtful, he would not exercise it." Does the powerful opposition which this scheme of internal improvement by Congress has met with, for many years, create no doubts on the subject? Does the proposed amendment to the Constitution, which has been laid on our tables, calling on the States to give to Congress this power, and emanating from such a source, (I make no allusion to any thing passing in the other branch of the Legislature, except what is laid on our tables, and printed,) does this excite no doubt? Does not the repeated recommendations of at least three Presidents, that such an amendment of the Constitution should be proposed to the Legislatures of the States, furnish some evidence that at least some doubts exist even among the best informed men in our country, as to the Constitutional power of Congress on this subject?

Our Government, sir, is a Government of opinion, and its strength and durability depend on the combination and preservation of the moral, as well as the physical power of the country in its favor; with these combined, it is the strongest Government on earth. Destroy the moral, and the physical power is gone.

There are two modes by which written constitutions may be destroyed—one by force, by the bayonet! Spain furnishes an example of this. The other by sapping and mining. Beware you do not furnish this example! By gradual encroachments on the rights of the States, and of the people, is there no danger of shaking the confidence of the people in the Administration of the Government? Is there no danger of destroying their confidence in the Constitution, which they have always considered as the charter of their liberties, and the grand palladium of their rights? Where is the necessity, at this time, for hazarding such an experiment? Your country has existed, it has prospered for many years without it. What is your present condition? It is true we were informed that there was a balance in the Treasury of $9,000,000. We have since been told, that nearly $3,000,000 of this is wanted to meet current expenses under former appropriations, leaving a balance of about $6,000,000. Have you not already pledged this, for the purchase of the seven per cent. stock, by an act passed during the present session? Does not your debt now exceed $90,000,000? And do you not propose to increase it, by adding $5,000,000 for Spanish claims? Do you believe a national debt a national blessing? Sir, you cannot meet the current demand for 1825, without new loans or taxes! We are told, sir, that only $30,000 is required by this bill! If I am not much mistaken, the Cumberland road commenced with a less amount; but how did it end? Nearly $2,000,000 have already been expended, and it is not ended yet? You are constantly appropriating your 20 and $30,000 for its preservation, for about one hundred and thirty miles of road; and you have now on your table a bill to extend this road—to increase this sinking fund. Sir, this Cumberland road affords an example, which ought to warn you of your danger—at least to pause and reflect before you proceed another step.

You have been engaged, session after session, in devising some mode for its preservation; and what is its present condition? In whose hands is the power to regulate and govern this road—to preserve it from wanton injury? Do the States through which it passes protect it? No, sir! Does Congress possess or exercise any jurisdiction over it? No, sir! You have passed bills for erecting toll-gates. Your bills have been returned by the Executive, with objections to their constitutionality. This great question is unsettled; and will you involve yourselves deeper and deeper in such difficulties? I beg gentlemen to pause. Do not open a drain from your Treasury, which will exhaust all your resources—excite sectional jealousies; array the old States, which have made their vast improvements by their own means and resources, against the new States, which are, by this scheme of internal improvement, to be the only gainers! Sir, will you, by passing this bill, open the doors of your Treasury to an expenditure, far beyond the civil list, and the appropriations for the support of your Army and Navy—and not even stop to inquire how these roads and canals are to be kept in repair? or who has the conservation of them?

We have been told, sir, that this scheme of internal improvement is to bind your union together. Let gentlemen beware, lest, in their great zeal to bind the union of these States, they unfortunately break the cord!

I hope, sir, the motion for postponement will prevail, and that we shall wait until an opportunity be offered for the States to act upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution granting to Congress the power in question, and to pay off our national debt; and if, sir, the amendment proposed to the Constitution should be adopted, and your Treasury overflow, we shall all cheerfully unite in "providing for the common defence and in promoting the general welfare." But if the motion to postpone shall not prevail, I shall feel it my duty to propose an amendment, to clear the bill of Constitutional objections, which it has not been in my power to propose in Committee of the Whole.

The question was then taken on indefinite postponement, and decided by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. Barbour, Bartlett, Bassett, Bradley, Buck, Burleigh, Burton, Cady, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Cary, Clark, Cobb, Collins, Conner, Crafts, Craig, Culpeper, Day, Dwinell, Eaton, Edwards of North Carolina, Findlay, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Foote of New York, Frost, Garnett, Gatlin, Gist, Hall, Harvey, Herrick, Hobart, Hogeboom, Hooks, Jenkins, Kidder, Lathrop, Leftwich, Lincoln, Litchfield, Livermore, Long, Longfellow, McCoy, Mangum, Mallary, Markley, Matson, Morgan, O'Brien, Plumer of New Hampshire, Randolph, Reed, Richards, Rives, Saunders, Sharpe, Sibley, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smyth, Spaight, Sterling, A. Stevenson, Stoddard, Taylor, Ten Eyck, Thompson of Georgia, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyson, Van Rensselaer, Van Wyck, Whipple, Whitman, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, Wilson of South Carolina, and Wood—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Bailey, Baylies, J. S. Barbour, Bartley, Beecher, Blair, Breck, Brent, Brown, Campbell of Ohio, Carter, Cassedy, Cook, Crowninshield, Cushman, Cuthbert, Durfee, Dwight,

So the House refused to postpone the bill.

Mr. Foot moved the following amendment to the bill—to strike out all that follows the enacting clause, and insert the following:

"That, on application of the Legislature of any State or Territory, the President of the United States is hereby authorized to employ such officers of the corps of engineers as he may think proper, to make the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, of such roads and canals as he may deem of national importance in a military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail within such State or Territory; and cause a copy of such surveys, plans, and estimates, when completed, to be laid before Congress, and a like copy to be laid before the Legislature of such State or Territory."

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed and paid to each officer of the corps of engineers, in addition to the pay now allowed by law, — per day for each day such officer shall be employed under the provision of this act, as a full compensation for such services and extra expenses attending the same, to be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

The question being taken, without debate, the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REYNOLDS then moved to strike out the word "thirty" (in the appropriating clause) and insert "twenty." The question being taken, the amendment was negatived.

The question was then put on engrossing the bill for a third reading—and the yeas and nays being called for by McCoy, stood as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Bailey, Baylies, J. S. To-morrow was then assigned for the third reading of the said bill.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. TON then moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to take up the bill for a revision of the tariff.

Mr. RANDOLPH rose, and said: "Sufficient for the day is the evil thereof"—I hope the House will do no such thing.

Mr. HAMILTON was going on with some remarks, bearing in part on the merits of the bill, when Mr. TAYLOR called him to order—and the Chair decided that he was out of order, on a question merely to take up the bill, to go into its merits.

The question was then put on Mr. TON's motion, and carried—ayes 93, noes 82.

The House accordingly went into Committee of the whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair; and, on motion of Mr. TON, took up the tariff bill; which was read, in part, at the Clerk's table.

Some progress having been made in the reading—

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

The House then, on motion of Mr. WEBSTER, went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Samuel Brown.

Mr. W. stated the circumstances of the case, and quoted precedents to show that similar acts had frequently passed.

The Committee rose, and reported the bill without amendment; and, after some conversation between Mr. LITTLE and Mr. BURTON, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

WEDNESDAY, February 11.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Catharine Lauderman, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. L., from the same committee, made a report on the petition of John Bradford, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Bradford; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Hanson Kelly," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLEN, of Massachusetts, from the Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the bill from the Senate, to revive and continue in force an act, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, of the clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian," reported the same without amendment; and the bill was ordered to a third reading to-day; which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. RANKIN, respecting the boundary line of Arkansas, was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. OWEN, respecting the compensation of the registers and receivers of land offices, was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. FLOYD laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow, viz:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the rules and regulations compiled by General Scott, for the government of the army, and repealed by an act of Congress of the 7th of May, 1822, are now enforced in the army, or any part thereof, and by what authority the same has been adopted and enforced.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a land office at Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana.

On motion of Mr. FOOTE, of New York, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the term of service in the militia of the United States, from forty-five to forty years, except in cases of invasion or insurrection.

In pursuance of the notice given yesterday, Mr. THOMPSON, of Georgia, moved for leave to introduce a bill directing the payment of the Georgia militia claims, for services rendered during the years 1792, 1793, and 1794.

The SPEAKER decided that the said motion was not in order, inasmuch as the subject-matter embraced by the bill was already before the House, in the shape of a report from the Committee on Military Affairs, made on the 28th ultimo, which had been committed, and made the order of the day for a given day; and that the granting the leave asked to introduce the bill, would have the effect of bringing the same subject-matter into discussion in two different forms, and at two different periods.

Engrossed bills, of the following titles, viz :

An act to define the boundary line between the Edwardsville and Springfield land districts, in the State of Illinois; An act to authorize the issuing of letters patent to Samuel Brown; An act to procure the necessary plans, estimates, and surveys, upon the subject of roads and canals; were respectively read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz : "An act to secure the accountability of public officers and others;" and "An act authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war, for the naval service of the United States;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bills were respectively read twice, and committed, the first, to the Committee of Ways and Means; the second, to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. TOL, the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports.

Mr. TOL said that the subject of protecting domestic manufactures, by duties on imports, had been so often discussed, that a particular explanation on the part of the Committee, would not probably be wanted. That he should state the details and objects of the bill, and some of the reasons in their favor, as briefly as possible. That there was nothing here proposed that was new in principle—nothing but to extend and equalize a system which experience had shown to be most beneficial, and to give to other departments of domestic industry, and other oppressed portions of the community; something of that protection which our laws had so liberally and wisely given to the cultivators of cotton, of sugar, and to all the interests of navigation.

One object of the bill, said Mr. T., is, that, as to some certain manufactured articles, the raw materials of which exist in abundance at home, we should, by legislative provision, give to our own workmen, not the exclusive supply and command of even our own market, but barely give them a part of the business of furnishing our own people with the plain, rough necessities of life. That another object of equal importance was, that, instead of continuing to support the agriculturists of Europe in almost every thing, we may be compelled, by using more home manufactured articles, to give to the farmers of our own country some market for their products. And another object, not inferior in magnitude to either of the former two, was, to give to the country that strength and power which arise from possessing, within itself, the means of defence, and to rescue it from the danger and disgrace of habitual reliance upon foreign nations for the common daily necessities of life.

That the duties proposed were upon two distinct classes of articles. One class is that upon silks, linens, cutlery, spices, and some other things of less importance, most of which are not necessities by any means, and which, with few exceptions, do not much interfere with any home production, or with any manufacture which the country is now prepared for. That most of these articles were charged, in the bill, with the identical increase recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury—this for the purpose of revenue chiefly, and to make up to the Government the deficiencies which may probably be occasioned by checking the excessive importation of other articles—but, that the important duties proposed in the bill were for the purposes of protection, and were upon iron, hemp, lead, glass, wool, and woollen goods.

Mr. T. said he was not going to trouble the Committee with a debate upon the question, whether our country ought to be dependent upon the monarchies of Europe for those necessary articles, if such dependence can be avoided. Upon that matter he was content to take the opinion of the Committee, such as it was already, and would go on to ask whether such dependence could be avoided.

It is known that almost every State in the Union is capable of producing iron sufficient for the supply of its own population, and, many of them, a great deal more; and that this can be effected without taking a single hand from any profitable employment, and without any stimulus, except that of a market.

As to hemp, it was not extravagant to say, that, of first rate hemp land, for every one acre which can be found, throughout all Europe, we have, perhaps, ten acres cleared, and not applicable to any other profitable cultivation. That in lead, we may challenge the globe, having not mines only, but whole territories of the richest ore, perfectly inexhaustible, and this in the vicinity of navigable waters. That, of wool, it was certain that not only every State, but every district of every State, was capable of producing enough, at least, for all our own uses. That of glass, the materials are every where. If Providence, said Mr. T., meant any country to be independent of others for the means of subsistence, that country is ours. The question then comes, Have our people industry and spirit enough to make use of these natural advantages of the country? The only effectual protection, generally, which our manufactures ever had, was by the late war. Thus, possessing by accident what other nations give by legislation to their own people, the command of the home market, our workmen made a progress that never was exceeded any where. Iron was fabricated to an extent wanting but about three thousand tons of the whole consumption of the country. Our woollen manufactures, though not quite so far advanced, were carried on with equal vigor, and with the same prospect of ultimate success, or rather with the same certainty of soon becoming fully adequate to the wants of the country. Our home supply of white and red lead, and shot, was equally sufficient. Earthen wares were fabricated in immense quantities, and with an elegance beginning to rival the workmanship of Europe. In glass, our people not only began to rival, but actually had rivalled, the workmen of England. Except some fine articles rarely wanted, we were supplied altogether from the home manufacture. It is notorious, said Mr. T., that all our manufactures of iron, lead, glass, earthen wares, woollen, and cotton goods, flourished. We say that they also caused the country to flourish by giving employment to the industrious, a market to the farmer, value to property, life to every sort of valuable business.

The Tariff Bill.

Peace came, and shortly after, the new tariff. It may, said Mr. T., be deemed absurd to argue now against a law which passed eight years ago, and the mischief of which, whatever it is, may now be supposed to be done and irretrievable. But the mischief of it is not yet finished. The tariff of 1816, is what is here proposed to be repealed in part, and it is necessary now to protest against the impolicy of the measure. What at that time was the situation of the country every one knows. The most important of our manufacturing establishments were just beginning. They were yet to gain skill in management, system, habit, all the indispensable requisites which experience only can give. Probably nine tenths, at least, of the owners were in debt, and only getting slowly out of it by the weekly profits of their business. In a word, according to the emphatic name long ago given by universal popular consent, they were, in every respect, infant manufactures. To expect that, under such circumstances, our countrymen should be able to rival in cheapness, the old, established foreign manufactures, was to expect what never yet happened in any country. So that, what in 1816 was called a moderate protecting duty would scarcely have been adequate protection against a fair and liberal European competition, but was absolutely nothing against the little tricks of oppression by which wealthy foreign manufacturers can afford to throw away cargoes of their goods, at reduced prices, or at no prices, in order to break down a growing rival, and indemnify themselves by fleecing the whole country afterwards.

It was not, continued Mr. T., said or believed, that there was any design by the tariff of 1816, to put down our rising manufactures. But the mistake was not pernicious.

It was the fashion of the day to consider the question of protection to domestic industry, not as a question between our manufacturers and those abroad, or between our own country and foreign nations, but as a question merely between our own manufacturers on the one side, and all the remaining classes of our own people on the other; and that whatever could be withheld from the mechanic was not to be lost to the nation—not at all, but only divided among the farmers, the planters, and the merchants. Then there was the cry about taxing the many for the benefit of the few; and monopoly. But what had chief effect in destroying our manufactures, and almost bringing us back again into colonial bondage, was that theory of foreign speculative writers called political economists. A doctrine which is now mentioned, because it is yet adhered to, and if not opposed, is now as conclusive against the bill as it was in 1816 against any efficient protection of domestic industry. This doctrine teaches that all interference like the present, by legislation, has merely the effect to force capital from one employment into another. That this forcing can only be from an employment more productive into an employment less productive, to the certain injury of the community. The argument prevailed. We have seen the effects.

Under this tariff, said Mr. T., first went all the newly erected manufactures of earthen ware. They and their workmen are now no more talked of than if they never had existed. In the same way went the most of our glass factories, our manufactures of white and red lead, our woollens, our hemp. Domestic iron has lingered a while longer, and still holds a feeble existence, dwindling every year, and gradually sinking under foreign importations. All the devastations and losses of the war were nothing compared with the devastations and losses of manufacturing capital under the tariff of 1816.

But, said Mr. T., the sum total of destruction of domestic industry will never be credited, unless we refer to the public records for the amount of manufactures brought from abroad, by which our own have been oppressed, excluded, and supplied. In the first year of peace, we imported, or there was imported for us, of lead and shot, thirteen millions of pounds; of white and red lead, seven millions; perhaps more than enough for two years' consumption of the country, even if we had none of our own. The average of the imports of both since the peace, amounts, for each year, to 7,749,368 pounds and the average cost, to near half a million of dollars a year.

Of hemp, in the first year of peace, we received 6,507 tons. This is the highest importation, except that of 1822, which was 8,903 tons. Average importation of hemp, since the peace, 4,972 tons each year.

Cost of it, in 1821	-	-	-	$510,489
1823	-	-	-	652,591

This is altogether independent of the manufactures of hemp, for which, for the last three years, we have paid, on an average, $849,603 a year.

Earthen ware, being altogether an ad valorem article, the amount imported cannot be conveniently ascertained, except for some few late years.

In 1822, we paid for them	-	-	-	$1,061,263
1823	-	-	-	1,047,708

All these values and sums are of the imports, after deducting the yearly re-exportations of the same article; and show the quantities consumed in the country. Glass is, partly, an ad valorem article.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

For the year 1823, it cost us upwards of half a million of dollars.

Upon an average of the last three years, our imported woollen goods have cost us nearly nine millions a year. That is—

1823	-	-	-	-	7,786,577

During the first year of peace, our country was inundated with foreign woollen goods, to the amount of $14,685,399. No doubt but a considerable portion of them were sent for the express purpose of glutting the market with double the quantity that could be consumed.

Domestic bar iron made the longest resistance. Our foreign supply for 1816, the first year of the peace, was

In 1817, it rose to	-	-	-	12,282 tons
	-	-	-	19,479 tons

And varied from that but inconsiderably, until 1822, when it amounted to thirty-one thousand one hundred and seven tons. In 1823, it amounted to thirty-three thousand seven hundred and eighty-seven tons; and, in the same year, the consumption of imported sheet iron, rods, and hoops, was seven thousand and forty-one tons. Even pig iron has gradually increased from one hundred and four tons, in 1818, to an importation of three thousand one hundred and eleven tons in 1823. Add that all the steel we use is imported. But of this there is no complaint. Perhaps it cannot be fabricated at home as good as the imported. Steel is not charged with any additional duty by this bill. Add, also, the manufactures of iron and steel, which are imported to the amount of about two millions of dollars a year. But there is no complaint of this. Perhaps our workmen in the fine manufactories of those metals are not so skilful as the European. There is nothing so intolerable as the dependence on foreigners for what we may have as good or better at home; which is the case of iron.

It was, said Mr. T., estimated by our statistical writers in 1816, that the quantity of bar iron necessary for a yearly consumption of the United States, was from forty-eight to fifty thousand tons. Since that time, from the decay in agriculture, in manufactures, in building, in every species of improvement and of useful business, and from the frugality which belongs to poverty, it is probable that the yearly consumption of bar iron has been lessened eight or ten thousand tons. But, however improbable, let it be supposed to continue the same, and to amount to forty-eight thousand tons a year. Then we import thirty-three thousand tons from Europe, and make for ourselves fifteen thousand. If any gentleman is prepared to say this is as it ought to be, then he must contend that we should be in the high road of national wealth, if our farmers were to get from abroad two-thirds of the grain and provisions for their families. It is notorious that these thirty-three thousand tons of iron may be made at home, that the workmen, while not employed in that business, can be employed in any other profitable business. That the food by which they could be sustained is now without a market, and useless.

If so, whatever is paid to Europe for iron, is paid for what may be had, in substance, for nothing, at home. That is, it will cost the nation nothing, nor cost the consumer any more than what he now pays, except that small addition which arises from the higher rate of wages of labor; a cost which must inevitably be more than made up to him, the consumer, in a hundred different ways.

Thus, sir, said Mr. T., for these plain, common necessities, which our own country is so competent to produce, lead, hemp, earthen wares, woollen goods, and unmanufactured iron, we go on paying a tribute to foreigners of more than thirteen millions of dollars a year; and, from a visionary fear of forcing capital into an unproductive channel, by protecting domestic industry, we have ended by forcing our own manufacturing capital into non-existence, and our workmen into beggary. What advantage has accrued to any portion of the community to compensate for this loss? Who is benefited? Not the farmer. His share of the gains from the suppression of manufactures is only to have the produce of his farm left perishing on his hands for want of a market. As little has the merchant gained, whose profits have been sinking with the decay of domestic industry. As little has the Government gained, which, twice, in time of peace, has been compelled to resort to loans to defray its yearly expenses.

It is supposed, said Mr. T., that, during the war, our manufacturer took advantage of the situation of the country, and extorted high prices; and that now he may be enabled to lay his neighbors under contribution and extort prices exactly in proportion to the increase of the duties. It is probable enough that, during the war, and at all other times, our manufacturers have taken the highest market prices for their goods. Buy where you can buy the cheapest, is the maxim of the political economist, without inquiring whether you buy from a friend or an enemy. Whether this maxim is right or not, one thing is certain, that, sell where you can sell the highest, has been the general practice of every seller since the world began, and to expect otherwise, is to expect an impracticable refinement in the morality of trade, and useless, even if it were practicable.

But, said Mr. T., the objection seems founded on a total mistake in another respect. High duties on the rival imports are not for the purpose of enabling the manufacturer to sell his wares high, and never can have that effect, but precisely the opposite effect. Mr. T. spoke only of those articles which can be made at home to any necessary extent, and the raw material of which abounds at home. It is protection only which enables the manufacturer to sell them cheaply. And protection will be found invariably to have that effect in England, in France, in this country, in every country that we know of. The reason why protection from foreign rivals should be so absolutely necessary to the cheapness of any manufacture, need not be accurately inquired into, when we know the invariable fact. Perhaps it is that cheapness depends essentially upon the assurance of a market; a steady demand. The great market, the home market, creates this demand. The profits of business, to be very small, must be very certain. This certainly can never be had without an exclusion of accidental supplies. Probably an auction of cargoes of cotton goods every month, in the neighborhood of the best established cotton manufactory in England, would, in two years' time, be sufficient to break it down. Such exclusion is peculiarly necessary to manufacturing establishments when beginning. No industry, no skill, no economy, can hold them up if abandoned by their Government, and left exposed to be undersold by foreign rivals, who know that to stop them is to destroy them. So familiar is this to the two greatest manufacturing nations of the world, England and France, that, when they mean peculiarly to cherish any manufacture, (which they invariably do, every manufacture which their people are, or can be made competent to,) they do not content themselves with a duty of twenty-five or thirty per cent. on the foreign rival commodity, but they impose a duty nearly equal to, and sometimes above, the value of the article, or they prohibit it altogether.

As to details of the bill, Mr. T. observed, that, on cotton goods, the bill left the duties as it found them, with one exception. The minimum valuation of imported cloths is raised from twenty-five cents the square yard, to thirty-five cents. The intent is to give protection to fabrics superior in fineness, by two or three grades, to those which are now protected. As to the very lowest priced goods, and those in the second and third grades from the lowest, the addition here proposed to the duty is merely nominal. Those goods will never be imported. The duty, as to them, is already effectual. It is clear that immense benefits have accrued to the country from that prohibition. This valuation of thirty-five cents prohibits no cotton goods which may not be fabricated better at home than any imported, and cheaper, too, most certainly, as soon as foreign competition is excluded, and never before.

A specific duty is proposed, of six cents per square yard, on cotton bagging. It is understood that the war, which excluded importations, gave to Kentucky and other Western States the opportunity to supply the cotton-growers with bagging—a trade not hurtful to either side, but which is now prostrated. The duty of six cents is intended to be protective and prohibitory, and to give to those States which manufacture the bagging, and which consume vast quantities of cotton, an advantage corresponding in a very small degree with the protecting duty enjoyed by the cotton-grower of three cents a pound.

As to the specific duties on sundry articles of hard ware, Mr. T. said those were taken chiefly from a list furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury, some years ago, in answer to a call from the House. This was from a desire to substitute specific duties wherever practicable. Complaints are made, that, in some items, the change proposed will be inconvenient. If the Committee think so, these will be struck out.

If, continued Mr. T., the prevalence of smuggling is apprehended from this increase of the duties, a little reflection will perhaps show the alarm to be unfounded. The duties here proposed are not extravagantly high, not amounting to one-half of the usual protecting duties in other countries. There seems no just reason to apprehend that the practice ever can be carried on in this country so as materially to affect any provision of the law, either for revenue or for the protection of domestic manufactures. No ship-owner, no captain, incurs the risk of forfeiting ship and cargo for the sake of evading the duties on such articles as can be clandestinely landed. This dread of smuggling is perhaps imported from Great Britain, and received here, like many other impressions, without much inquiry whether it is applicable to our situation. The British coast is, perhaps, as extensive as our own. France lies within sight. A boat may sail from one country to the other, probably, in less than one night. The English duty on French silks is said to be between eight and nine dollars per pound. So on brandies—their duties are very high. So on laces. The English smuggler, if successful, gains enormous profit; whereas here there are not only all the difficulties arising from distance, but there is no such temptation of profit. Take the article said to be charged with the highest duty in our tariff for the purpose of protection—that of coarse cottons—which are said to pay a duty of 100 per cent: suppose they could be landed without detection—would they be smuggled? No. Because smuggling can only be of those articles which can be bought very cheap and sold very dear. So, take any article charged the highest in this bill for the purpose of protection. Take those woollen cloths, subject to the minimum valuation of forty cents, or those subject to that of eighty cents: so far from any just ground to apprehend smuggling, reason and fact will show that a reduction of their price below the lowest that can be imported will inevitably follow their protection.

As to the question, what effect this bill, if passed, will have upon the revenue? it may be answered, Mr. T. thought, satisfactorily, to every friend of the measure. The importation of some things may be stopped, and are intended to be stopped; but of those items the most important to the revenue, the reduction of the amount of imports by the substitution of domestic goods must be more than made up by the augmentation of the duty. Besides, the Secretary of the Treasury has clearly shown, in his communication to Congress at the last session, that the most of what can be lost to the revenue by the prevalence of home manufactures may be restored in the augmented duties upon articles which will still be imported. For three years, or perhaps longer, it may be reasonably expected that the revenue will be increased by the change here proposed. But, if the contrary were apprehended, that would be no reason against increasing the real wealth of the country by protecting domestic industry.

I have, said Mr. T., but one thing more to mention. On this important question, supposing the matter to be in itself doubtful, have we nothing

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

by which to direct the judgment to a safe conclusion? We have. We have the opinions of our own experienced statesmen. We have the examples of other nations. We have actual fact and experiment at home. Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Jefferson have shown that our only source of national prosperity was in the protection of domestic manufactures, the latter publicly retracting an opinion to the contrary in his Notes on Virginia. Every President of the Union, whenever he has mentioned the subject, which has been very frequently, has given the same opinion. So every Secretary of the Treasury. It is not known that one public man, since the formation of the Government, except members of Congress representing districts, has given a different opinion. It is notorious that the chief nations of Europe are wealthy and powerful almost exactly in proportion to the vigilance with which they exclude the products of foreign industry and cherish their own; and others weak and miserable exactly in proportion to their dependence on the industry of their neighbors. But we want no example of foreign nations. We have an experiment of our own, conclusive. I mean, said Mr. T., the prohibitory duty imposed in the year 1816 on cotton cloths, the only prohibitory duty we ever had in this country for the protection of domestic industry. Like the principal articles in this bill: there the prohibitory duty was on an article, the raw material of which abounds at home. Now, it ought to be ever remembered that, when that prohibitory duty on the coarser cotton cloths, by minimum valuation, was proposed by Mr. Dallas, then Secretary of the Treasury, (for the immortal honor of the measure belongs to him,) no effort was left untried by the opponents of protection to crush the measure. And, even after it became a law, the merchants of Salem, by a memorial to this House, showed how detestable the measure was considered to be by them, and assailed it by predictions of every ruinous consequence. What, then, were those arguments against the prohibitory duty on coarse cottons, and the pernicious consequences which, according to the fears of the merchants, and the books of the economists, were most surely to happen? First, that imported coarse cottons were used in immense quantities, chiefly by the poor; that nothing could be more iniquitous and oppressive, than to wring from the poor double prices for the necessities of life, in order to divide the proceeds among a set of rapacious manufacturers, who, so far from being able to enter into competition with the workmen of India or England, could never live by their trade, unless they had a charter for extortion, and were quartered, by force of law, upon the hard working agriculturists. Then, there was monopoly—monopoly; and taxing the many for the benefit of the few. Was this all? Not half. The people would have India muslins, in spite of the law; smuggling would come in fashion, and morals be spoiled. Commerce and ship-building would sink, together with the public revenue. Now, said Mr. T., if, in stating the consequences which really have followed the prohibition of foreign coarse cottons, I state any thing which any gentleman does not know to be the fact, let him consider the whole experiment as thrown away. Instead of the oppression of the poor, and a tax on the community to support the manufacturer, that article, protected by the prohibitory duty, is now afforded to the consumer at a less price per yard, than those flimsy India muslins used to be sold for; and if you take durability and other qualities into view, it is now sold for one-half, perhaps for one-third, its former price. Instead of our workmen being found unequal to the India or British manufacturer, they have been able to contend with the British themselves, on equal ground, in every market, successfully, as is proved by the notorious practice of the British workmen, of palming their coarse cotton goods upon their customers, under the name and disguise of American. Instead of smuggling, it is clear that those India muslins could not now be sold in this country, if the duty was taken off, and a bounty allowed on their importation. Instead of supporting the agriculture of India, by wearing their cottons, we create an immense market for the raw material raised in our own country; and another market to our own farmers, for the immense quantities of provisions consumed by the workmen. Instead of destroying commerce, it is a fact, that, in the town of Providence, where the prohibitory duty had an operation as strong as in any place, the coasting trade is more than doubled. All these benefits have followed protection, in one instance, of an article fabricated from our own raw material. Similar benefits, in a greater or less degree, may reasonably be expected, from a similar protection of woollen manufactures, and of hemp, lead, glass, and iron.

When Mr. TON had concluded—

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR said, that, though he was entirely opposed to the bill, he was desirous that its advocates should have an opportunity of fully setting forth all that could be said in its favor, and the members of the House have time for a further consideration of its details. As soon as sufficient time for these two objects had elapsed, he should move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. RANDOLPH then observed, that, on a late occasion, a gentleman from Massachusetts, who, when he did not instruct, seldom failed to entertain the House, had told us, that, if, in opposition to his resolution, he should chance to encounter a wind-mill, he should be obliged to take a tilt with it. He must confess, that he had not a tythe of the gallantry which distinguished the gentleman from Massachusetts—he had no particular relish to encounter wind-mills of any kind—but, of all the wind-mills that ever could appal the imagination of Don Quixotte himself, defend me, (said Mr. R.,) from wind-mills that go by water. As he wished for some respite, before entering upon a bill that was to signalize, perhaps to eternize, the Eighteenth Congress, he moved that the Committee rise.

The question being taken on the motion for rising, it was lost—ayes 75, noes 84.

Mr. TON then moved to rise, and report the bill without amendment.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, after inquiring whether it was in order to offer amendments to the bill, after it should go into the House, and being answered by the Chairman in the negative, observed, that the gentlemen opposed to the bill had not come prepared to enter immediately on the discussion of its details, and he hoped some further time would be allowed for consideration. If the friends of the bill were determined to press it, they must be met; but, he trusted they would indulge its opponents with some further time; and he renewed the motion made by Mr. RANDOLPH, that the Committee now rise.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, spoke to the question of order; which, he stated to be, that amendments might be offered in the House, which went to diminish the amount of duties proposed by the bill, but not such as were intended to increase that amount.

Mr. CLAY said, he was far from wishing to prevent a fair and deliberate discussion of the bill; but some regard must be had to time. Numerous petitions had been presented on the general subject of a revision of the tariff, the reading of which had been dispensed with, and they still lay on the table of this House. Would it not be respectful to these numerous petitioners, (and they amounted to thousands,) to have some further disposition given to these documents? They should either be taken up and read, or referred to a committee, to have their contents presented in a condensed form, to the Committee of the Whole. The voice of almost the whole country had come up to the House, setting forth a picture of distress, invoking the interposition of Congress—that voice ought at least to be heard.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that the reading of the petitions would occupy much time. He had taken pains to count their number. It amounted, more than three weeks ago to seventy, and must be now over a hundred. He suggested their reference to the Committee on Manufactures; and withdrew the motion for rising.

The reading of the bill was then gone through, when—

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved to strike out the 255th and 256th lines, containing a duty on imported spirits; the enacting of which clause would not increase but rather impair the revenue, and would, besides, operate as a bounty on intemperance.

Mr. CLAY expressed a hope that the motion would not prevail.

Mr. FOOT replied, that he was sorry no friend of the bill rose to state the reason which induced the committee to insert this clause. For himself, he was not to be driven from his opposition to the measure by a mere suggestion or wish of any gentleman. He believed the clause would have a tendency materially to injure the foreign commerce of the country. The present duty was already so high as to amount almost to a prohibition of the West India trade. If the object of gentlemen was to destroy foreign commerce, be it so, but let it be avowed.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, was not disposed to go into a discussion of the merits of the bill at this time. If the gentleman from Connecticut thought that a consumption of that article which so powerfully affected the upper story, was an advantage to the country, let him then endeavor to strike out this clause. But, if the interests of morality were, as was generally believed, concerned in diminishing its consumption, then the clause ought to stand. Rum had been, with much truth, denominated “the Indian’s Devil,” but, if the interests of commerce required that the whole country must get intoxicated, he would thank the gentleman to say which was best, that they should use foreign or domestic spirits for that purpose.

Mr. FOOT said, that though he professed no great skill in such matters, he would answer the gentleman from Kentucky. It was not best to get intoxicated with new spirits, but with that which had a little age. But was it seriously true, that the committee who reported the bill were desirous of encouraging the manufacture of spirits? If so, they took the proper method, in laying this additional duty on that which is imported.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, in rejoinder, that he had often been astonished at the fund of ideas sometimes manifested by his Eastern friends; but he was happy that he could now account for all the queer notions from that section of our country.

Mr. McDUFFIE observed that the subject was of a nature little suited to levity: it called for grave discussion. What was the state of facts in relation to it? Seven or eight years since, we enjoyed a great amount of revenue from the importation of foreign spirits; but the duty already laid had reduced that duty by two millions of dollars. The question was clearly a question of revenue. Was it pretended that whiskey was an article the manufacture of which ought to be cherished? It was a principle which had long been settled in political economy, that luxury was a proper subject for taxation and revenue. But the present clause went to diminish the revenue from this source, while, at the same time, it tended to increase the use of the article by the people. Of all the various descriptions of manufacture, this was, in every view, the least worthy to be encouraged. It involved little skill, capital, or machinery; and could not be argued for on any of the grounds usually taken on the subject of the tariff.

Mr. CLAY differed entirely from the gentleman from South Carolina; but he was very unwilling to go into discussion of the general principles of the bill on one of its mere incidental details. A better course would be for some gentleman to move to strike out the enacting clause, and then let the Committee take up the measure on general grounds. It has been said that the clause in question would diminish the revenue. This might possibly be the fact; but must it, therefore, necessarily diminish the wealth of the country? Suppose we had imported ten millions of gallons of foreign spirits. It is true, we derived the amount of the revenue upon it, which, so far, was a gain; but, so far as we thereby encouraged foreign agriculture, we paid an equivalent for what we gained. But, if, instead of having been manufactured abroad, and paid for abroad, the same quantity had been made at home, and paid for at home, which would have been the greatest gain to the country? Wealth at home was to be preferred to that which was brought into the country from abroad. And were this duty, instead of being diminished, to be increased yet more than is now proposed; were the tax on it to be increased, so as to go to an absolute prohibition, I, for one, said Mr. C., am prepared for myself, and I may say for my constituents, to meet a tax on our home products. I am not to be frightened by that ominous word "excise—excise," if the wealth of the country is substantially to be promoted. I agree that the Western country is interested in the manufacture of spirits; but I ask, by importing spirits, are you not encouraging the foreign manufacturer? We may experience the same vicissitude in seasons and in crops that other countries have experienced—we may experience times of scarcity, and even of famine. Whatever encourages the extensive growing of grain, provides you with a resource against such a calamity. But this article affects not only the grain-growing, but the fruit-growing, and the malt-making districts of our country—they are all interested in the exclusion of foreign spirits. Look at the example of England; she excludes the brandies of France and the gin of Holland; and so do France and Holland exclude England and each other. The duty has a double operation; it not only encourages home manufactures, but home agriculture likewise—while the admission of foreign spirits not only goes to encourage the foreign manufacturer, but the foreign agriculturist also.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

But, I will not anticipate the discussion of the general question—when that comes up, I think I shall be able clearly to show that the national wealth is the only substratum on which to raise taxation.

Mr. GARNETT, of Virginia, was surprised to hear the tax on foreign spirits advocated on the ground of encouraging agriculture—its operation was directly the reverse. Suppose you send a bushel of wheat abroad, and get in exchange a gallon of rum; you thereby destroy the demand abroad for one bushel of grain; but this bushel of grain, if distilled at home, will produce two gallons of spirits—so that when home spirits are used in the same quantity as foreign, they occasion only half the demand for agricultural products that would arise if imported were used.

Mr. TOMLINSON, of Connecticut, agreed in the opinion, that it was improper to discuss the general questions involved in the bill, on incidental motions respecting its details; but, since the motion has been made to strike out the present clause, he considered it his duty to support that motion. The Speaker, in the remarks he had made on this subject, seemed to think that the people of this country were all agriculturists—and to forget that our commerce had any existence. But surely that commercial interest which had proved to this country a source of so much wealth, aggrandizement, and national glory, was at least to be looked to as much as the interest of agriculture. The honorable Speaker seemed to believe that we are to have no reference whatever, in our discussion of the duty, to our exports which bring in the foreign spirits—to the fish, the live stock, the lumber which go, not only from the Eastern, but from the Middle States, and from States south of this District also, out to the West Indies, and bring back the spirits in return. Even under the duty, as it now stands, the West India trade is languishing—the only profit is on the outward cargoes, while there is always a dead loss on the returns. In this exchange of commodities consists a great part of the commerce of this country. The increase of duty on foreign spirits now proposed, will destroy that branch of commerce altogether—the forests of Maine will not be cleared—the fisheries will languish. The honorable Speaker has professed his readiness to meet an excise. If he is ready now to propose an excise on domestic spirits to the same amount as the proposed duty on foreign, I am prepared to go with him in both. I should have no objection that the committee make the duty on the imported article fifteen cents instead of six, provided they lay an excise of the same amount on the domestic article. That would indeed be a public blessing—and would, of itself, produce a fund more than sufficient to carry on and complete that magnificent scheme of internal improvements, which has this day passed this House. The measure, as now proposed, operates in a peculiar manner, on one particular district of country. The interests of the farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer, would then be alike promoted. As to any moral influence that is hoped to arise from the prohibition, it is almost nothing. I admit that no greater social or individual evil can curse a nation, than the excessive use of ardent spirits; but, will a duty of six cents a gallon, cure, or in any degree lessen this evil? If the object is to destroy the use of spirits, let us have a duty that will prove adequate to its end. When I heard the section read, that is now under discussion, I did suppose that it was a provision intended simply for revenue; and if such was the calculation of the committee, they have labored under a great mistake as to facts. The effect of an increase of duty on spirits, has invariably been to diminish revenue. What has been the experience of England in this matter? Her duties on imported spirits amount, now, to about fifteen shillings sterling a gallon; and yet, the article brings less into the Exchequer, than when the duty was only two and six pence. It is plain, however, from the very argument of the honorable Speaker, that revenue alone was not the object. Sir, I am no advocate for the use of spirits; nor is the country from which I come, peculiar at all, (whatever the honorable member from Kentucky may suppose,) for its attachment to the use of what has such surprising effects on the upper story. And, lest I should be misunderstood, I will assure the friends of the bill, that I am entirely friendly to it; and that, were this clause stricken out, the bill should have my cordial approbation and support.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, then observed, that, if gentlemen blended any views to morality in their speculations on this subject, spirits were certainly a most praiseworthy subject of taxation. But if the section now objected to operates as a prohibition of foreign, and, at the same time, a bounty to domestic spirits, the objects of morality are not likely to be promoted by so high a duty. If it will be any blessing to the country; if it will add any thing to the lovely scene of its domestic felicity, to have a loathsome still on every side of the picture, the country is likely to be supremely blessed. The honorable Speaker, no doubt, prefers whiskey to brandy, and we seem in a fair way to have, in abundance, the pure Western stuff, fresh from the still. It further appears, that we are about to have a famine, and that it will be necessary to keep the whole country drunk for fear of a dearth. We have indeed pleasing prospects before us. But, to be serious, when, from the days of Lord Chesterfield, till the present time, the records of British history are filled with the discussion of this subject—when it has been so ably argued on both sides of the Atlantic, and the whole subject was, as he supposed, so fully understood and settled, he had really been surprised to find a provision of this kind introduced into the bill.

Mr. CLAY rejoined. He had been much amused with the witticisms of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina; but he was restrained from entering into any thing like a general discussion of the question, by a fear that this was not a favorable time of the day for such discussion.

Yet he could not refrain from noticing the argument of his honorable friend from Connecticut. If he had rightly apprehended that argument, it was in substance this: The produce of Connecticut is sent to the West Indies, and spirits constitute the return cargo. If you impose a higher duty on spirits, the produce of Connecticut can no longer be sent to the West Indies. But this same argument is urged with equal reason against the whole tariff. If it taxes an article raised in the Middle States, then the gentlemen from the Middle States urge this argument. If you tax an article that is the produce of the South, then gentlemen from the South urge it. Each different section of the country holds the same language. The honorable gentleman is quite ready to concur in an excise on the Western whiskey, because that will not affect Connecticut; but if any duty is proposed that touches Connecticut, then our commerce is gone at once! The glory of the nation is annihilated; the country is going to speedy ruin!

The argument is fallacious. Its fallacy consists in this: it assumes that those persons in the West Indies, who want the produce of Connecticut, will not take it unless the Connecticut trader will take rum in exchange, (which he will not do if the duty is raised;) but this is not the fact. I say that, if they want the produce of Connecticut, as they do, and will, and must continue to want it, and the Connecticut trader refuses rum, they will give him something better. They only give rum now because he will take it, and it is the worst thing they have to part with. As he did not intend to pursue the discussion now, Mr. C. said he should conclude with expressing a hope that all deliberations and discussion of the Committee would be marked with a spirit of moderation, amenity, and mutual forbearance.

Mr. CUTHBERT said that he only rose to remark that the course the discussion was taking, was, in itself, a proof that the Committee ought now to rise and report. The honorable Speaker, it appeared, was averse to this skirmishing mode of warfare—and why? It deranges his legions—it breaks the order and system of his array, and thereby impairs his strength. He thought it was no more than what was due to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Manufactures to give at least one night's reflection to the extended exposition of the bill with which he had favored the Committee. The honorable gentlemen had spoken of a spirit of forbearance. Was there not some danger of its being thought that a determination to press the discussion farther at this time would show some want of that spirit? He hoped the Committee would rise, and would himself make the motion to that effect, but that he preferred it should come from the other side.

Mr. CLAY then said he would with great pleasure oblige the honorable gentleman from Georgia. The only reason why he had before objected to rising was the early hour.

Mr. CLAY then made the motion, and the Committee rose and reported, and had leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, February 12.

Mr. CUSHMAN, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, made a report in relation to the works on said buildings, during the last year, and to their present state and condition, accompanied by a bill making appropriations for the public buildings; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK, from the committee appointed on the 9th of December last, on so much of the several acts passed for the admission of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, into the Union, as sets apart a portion of the money arising from the sale of public lands in those States, for the purpose of constructing roads and canals leading to those States, respectively, to which committee was referred, on the 2d instant, a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, reported a bill to authorize the laying out and opening of a road from Wheeling, in the State of Virginia, to the seat of government of the State of Missouri; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The resolution laid on the table by Mr. FLOYD, yesterday, was taken up, read, modified, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the rules and regulations compiled by General Scott for the government of the Army, are now enforced in the Army, or any part thereof, and by what authority the same has been adopted and enforced.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of contracts made by the Commissioners of the Navy, during the year 1823; which were laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by sundry statements, showing the commerce and navigation of the United States, during the year ending on the 30th September, 1823; which were laid on the table.

Mr. ISACKS called up the resolution, offered by him some time since, to inquire into the expediency of the continuance, for five years longer, of the pensions to the widows and orphans of such officers and privates as have fallen in battle, or been wounded in the late war.

The resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving the laws allowing a pension to the widows and orphans of such officers and privates of the Army who may have fallen in action, died in service, or of wounds received in service, during the late war, so as to continue the said pensions for the term of five years longer, after the expiration of the first terms, respectively."

Mr. WICKLIFFE inquired whether the widows and orphans of marines were included in the law proposed to be revived.

Mr. ISACKS answered that he understood not.

Mr. MCCOY hoped that the pension system would have leave to rest.

The question being put on agreeing to the resolution, it was carried. Ayes 70, noes 44.

Mr. CAMBRELENG stated that, as the House might be called on to vote on the tariff bill, in its present shape, he had taken pains to prepare a statement of what would be the practical operation of the provisions of that bill, which he was desirous of presenting to the House.

The statement was received, and, after an unsuccessful motion of Mr. CONDIOT to lay it upon the table, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TRACY called up the resolution, offered by him some days since, making certain inquiries of the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to real estate purchased by the United States. The resolution was taken up and agreed to.

Mr. LONGFELLOW, by leave of the House, presented a remonstrance and memorial from merchants and other inhabitants of the town of Portland, in the State of Maine, against the passage of any bill having for its object an increase of duties on foreign manufactures, upon their importation into the United States, for the purpose of protecting and encouraging domestic manufactures; which memorial and remonstrance was committed to the Committee of the Whole on that subject.

Mr. HENRY, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the surveying and making of a road from a point in the northwestern boundary of the State of Ohio, near the foot of the rapids of the Miami of Lake Erie, to Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan; which bill was read twice; and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of devising suitable regulations for the preservation and police of the Capitol and its appurtenances; and Mr. VAN RENSSELAER, Mr. MERCER, Mr. FORSYTH, Mr. RICH, and Mr. LATHROP, were appointed the said committee.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports.

The question pending, from yesterday, was, on the motion to amend the bill, by striking out the words following, viz: "On all foreign distilled spirits, fifteen per centum upon the duties now imposed by law, and in addition thereto"

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, first rose, in continuation of the debate on this motion, which he considered as involving the great principle of this bill, and particularly so far as it affected that section of the Union which he represented—a consideration which, he hoped, would excuse his troubling the Committee at this time. Looking at the contents of this bill, at the province of the committee which reported it, and the grounds on which it had been supported, he regarded it as a bill intended for the protection of manufactures, and not, as it seemed to be considered by the supporters of the motion, as a commercial or a revenue bill. Mr. W. said, he was himself disposed, by increasing the duties on imports, to extend to the infant manufactures of the country, and to the encouragement of its industry, all the protection that can be given to them. But, whilst he would do this, he was not disposed, by overdoing this encouragement, to be led into a state of things which would necessarily result in the establishment of a system of internal taxation in the country. He did not believe, he said that the Union is prepared, at this time, for that state of things. He spoke with great confidence for that portion of it by whose kindness he had now the privilege of addressing the House. However anxious the people of that part of the country might be to promote the interests of domestic manufactures, they were not prepared to go the length which some gentlemen, not in debate on this floor, indeed, but in private conversation, had seemed to intimate that this measure would carry us. They, said Mr. W., have no fondness for your excisemen and tax-gatherers. They learned a song in 1798, the memory of which they yet cherish, the chorus of which is "Liberty and no Excise!" In time of war, he said, they would cheerfully submit to the burdens of internal taxation, to provide for the support of the armies and navies of the country; but, in time of peace, they would as soon welcome a real blue-light man among them, as an exciseman. They would as soon hail, as brothers, those "just men made perfect," who, after having, by their entangling commercial relations, brought the country into a war, seemed to think that the machinery of our Government was not competent to its successful prosecution.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. W. did not make these remarks, he went on to say, as indicating the vote he was to give on this bill. If, however, he should be made sensible that the bill would lead to the state of things which some had anticipated, he could not give it his support. And one promise he was prepared to make; that, if the clause now under consideration were stricken from the bill, he must and would vote against it. Taking this bill as a whole, he could not regard it as a bill to increase the revenue of the country. There was no complaint, he observed, of any deficiency of revenue to meet all the expenditures of the Government—unless it should be desired for the more speedy extinction of the public debt, to which measure he professed himself friendly. "It was not a revenue bill; for, the House had been told, by the chairman of the committee who reported it, that its effect probably would be to diminish the revenue. Mr. W. therefore, regarded the bill simply as a manufacturing bill, having for its object the encouragement and protection of the manufacturing interest of the country. Viewing it in this light, if the clause now under consideration should be stricken out, what was promised to the section of country which he represented, in lieu of the sacrifice she is to make, by paying, in the increased cost of the manufactured articles she consumes, the additional duties proposed by the bill?"

The gentleman from Connecticut had professed a disposition to encourage manufactures, but was, at the same time, against the commercial interest contributing its proportion to the general sacrifice. The consumers of cloths, and other articles of importation, designated by the bill for higher duties, were called upon to contribute for the benefit of the manufacturers—for the bill could be considered in no other light than as a system of bounties to manufacturers, and, by this bounty, the price to the consumer was to be advanced. The commercial interest was not to contribute any thing, upon the plan of the gentleman from Connecticut, but the agricultural interest was to contribute all. Mr. W. replied to some of the arguments urged yesterday. Among other observations, he said, why is a further duty proposed to be laid on bar iron and lead? Because the country abounds in those articles, in quantity and quality equal to those of any other country in the world. So of the raw material of every other article of manufacture embraced in the bill. Now, Mr. W. asked, is it the policy of this country, while increasing the duty upon every article of importation, of which the country possesses the raw material, and the capacity for its manufacture, not only for home consumption but for exportation, to exclude the only manufacture, of any extent, of the Western country? Is there a greater reason for imposing higher duties on the other articles embraced in the bill, than on that now under consideration? Mr. W. here adverted to the amount of importation of foreign distilled spirits, as affected by the existing duties, and went into an inquiry whether this was not as fair an object of taxation as any other article of import. He would not inquire, he said, whether hilarity was more promoted by foreign or domestic distilled spirits—from either, it was sometimes too much promoted—gentlemen might, if they pleased, prefer the brandies of France, or the rum of Jamaica, to the spirit of domestic origin; but their preference of the one or the other did not affect the true point for inquiry here, viz. whether an article, which we can abundantly produce at home, is susceptible of higher taxation when coming from abroad, than it at present bears? It was a manufacture, surely, as worthy of protection as that of straw hats. The capital employed in the one manufacture is much greater than that which is employed in the other; and yet the House was called upon, by those who opposed the proposed duty on distilled spirits, to protect the manufacture of straw hats and bonnets by a tax upon leg-horns. It was as good an argument against taxing them as against taxing distilled spirits, that such a tax would operate to the prejudice of the commerce of the country. The duty on Russia hemp, too, might as well be objected to, on the ground that it weakens commerce, and lessens the supply of the article to the Eastern manufacturer. But, he said, it appeared that gentlemen were disposed to exact from the agricultural States encouragement for the manufacture of cotton and woollen cloths, but not to encourage the manufacture of whiskey and the growing of hemp, because a trade in them was necessary for the interests of commerce, &c. Mr. W. was for placing these two interests of the country on the same footing.

The only objections, he said, which he had heard to the increase of the duty on the importation of spirits, were, that it would lessen the revenue of the country, and disturb the commerce with the West India islands. As to the first of these objections, Mr. W. said, it would apply equally to every article of the bill. And, as to the second, he argued that the augmented importation of the raw material, molasses, from which rum is distilled, would more than compensate for the diminished importation of rum, which would be caused by the augmented duty, besides affording additional employment, in the manufacture of it, to the labor and industry of the country. Mr. W. then adverted to the proposed increase of duties on coarse cloths, of which a great quantity is consumed in the country which he represents, and to the tax to be levied upon his constituents to the amount of increase of duty, by the consequent augmentation of price of the article, whether of domestic or foreign manufacture. Why should this be exacted from his constituents, if any participation in corresponding advantages was wholly denied to them? Mr. W. said, he wished this bill to pass, if assured that it would not have the effect which some predicate of it. Yet he wanted to see something like reciprocity in its details. He was not willing, whilst his constituents were to be heavily burdened by the bill, that they should derive no benefit from it. He was not willing that the agricultural interest should be made to pay all, and receive nothing.

Mr. MALLARY observed, that the gentleman who had just spoken in opposition to the motion had assigned some reasons, which he considered unfounded. It was to be expected, that the discussion of a bill so wide in its extent, and affecting so many different interests, would produce some collision of opinions. There could scarcely be a provision in the whole bill which would not affect some parts of the country more than another. It was the duty of the friends of the policy to equalize the advantages, as well as the burdens, if any burdens should be imposed, throughout the country. However great the evils produced by the extensive use of spirits, they could not be avoided. It was an article of commerce of great extent, and it must be considered as such in our Legislative proceedings. The inquiry was, whether the duties already imposed were not sufficiently high? Has not protection to the domestic article already exceeded that of almost any other? The importation of spirits at a former period was enormously great, amounting to about twelve or fifteen millions of gallons in a single year. The duties upon it amounted to nearly two-fifths of the whole revenue. The tariff of 1816 has been the cause of reducing the import to about four millions of gallons per annum. The use of spirits has not diminished, but increased, from the cheapness of the domestic article, and increased population. The domestic produce has enjoyed the benefits. No part of the country has enjoyed greater advantages than the West. Let us inquire what has been the effect upon the trade and commerce of the Eastern States, especially of Connecticut. From one port, a few years ago, about fifty vessels were engaged in the West India trade—now they have eight or nine from the same port. Other ports have suffered equally great. Ought this particular branch of commerce be reduced any more? Have not the people concerned made sufficient sacrifices for the benefit of the other interests of the country? If burdens are to be imposed, ought they not to be applied to some other interests, which have not suffered as much? Mr. M. said, he was in favor of the bill, and should vote for it as it was, but should prefer it with the provision under discussion removed from it, and appealed to the friends of the bill to say, whether justice did not require that it should be done.

The gentleman from Kentucky, who has just spoken, says that the bill proposes a duty on woollens, which is in favor of the Eastern States—that the Western ought to have an equivalent. What equivalent have the Eastern people had for the almost total annihilation of the West India trade? The West have been gainers, while the East have been comparatively the losers. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to another important point—the comparison between the duties on spirits and the duties upon woollen goods. It is evident there is no proportion. The duty on spirits is about forty-two cents per gallon, on an average. The cost is about seventeen cents per gallon in the West Indies. The duty, therefore, is nearly two hundred and fifty per cent. already; add that proposed by the bill, and it will equal three hundred per cent.; and the West has reaped its full share, perhaps more, of the benefits of the high duties. In consequence of the cheapness of grain in the West, the article of spirits could be produced there much cheaper than in the East. When the Eastern people demand an increase of duty equal to three hundred per cent. on woollens, some equivalent should be discovered, or the West would have a right to complain. For his part, said Mr. M., he considered that the committee had presented a bill, which, in general, had given evidence of their research and wisdom. It should have his support, although he should prefer it if the motion should prevail.

Mr. TRACY, of New York, next presented some of his views on the subject. He should think, he said, that so small an augmentation of the duty on distilled spirits would not have any injurious effect on commerce. It appeared to him impossible that so slight an addition to the present duty could affect the importation of rum. If the augmentation of duty would have any effect at all, as it would increase the cost of rum, it would operate beneficially to our manufacturers of rum from molasses, and, molasses being the more bulky article of the two, it would thus operate beneficially also to the navigation of the country.

But, Mr. T. said, if it were otherwise, there were several items in this bill, inserted with a view—not with a view, certainly with the effect, to exclude the importation of the articles on which they propose duties. The proposed duty on iron ought to be intended to exclude, altogether, its importation. So also the duty on woollens. If any increase was to be made upon the present duty on woollens, it could only be justifiable with the intent and purpose of excluding altogether the importation of foreign goods of that description. If we legislate with this view, said Mr. T., to what object can the principle be more fairly applied than to distilled spirits? It would, to be sure, affect the revenue, to exclude foreign spirits altogether. But, he said, there were many other articles of importation, the exclusion of which would more seriously affect the revenue than the total exclusion of distilled spirits would. There was no increase of duty on any article extensively imported, that would so little affect the revenue, as this very one. The commercial interest would derive as much benefit from the importation of the raw material (molasses) as from the import of the manufacture from it. But, if the duty did affect commerce, it would not operate, in this respect, differently or more extensively than some other provisions of the bill.

Mr. T. said, he was opposed, altogether, to striking out this clause of the bill, because that part of the country which was most interested in this item would derive less benefit from the general provisions of this bill than any other. The particular district which he himself represented, for example, had no iron, no woollen manufactures, no capital, &c., to receive benefit from the provisions of this bill, and would yet have to pay its full proportion of the increased cost of the manufactures of the East, &c., growing out of this bill. What equivalent was offered to them? None, unless in the clause now proposed to be stricken out. The objection to this particular clause, therefore, Mr. T. said, came with an ill grace from any gentleman from the Eastern States; and, perhaps, of all the States, there would be no one so much benefited by this bill, should it pass, as the State of Connecticut, extensively a manufacturing State, and having, besides, the advantage, not common to other sections of the country, of possessing an extensive capital.

All the friends of this bill, Mr. T. said, must discover the necessity of not listening, at this time, to any proposition to amend it. Let us, said he, ascertain what is the strength of the House in regard to the general principle of this bill, and then see what amendments are advisable with a view to its ultimate passage. He hoped the gentleman from Connecticut, if friendly to this bill, would withdraw his motion to strike out the clause: If he was adverse to the general provisions of the bill, he ought still to withdraw the motion to try the question on the principle of the bill.

Mr. Foor, of Connecticut, said he was not hostile to the principle of the bill. He had believed, for a long time, that there ought to be a revision of the tariff of duties on imports; but it must be a judicious revision. He could not agree with the gentleman from New York, that the question should first be tried on the general principle of the bill, as he expressed it, when, in fact every particular item of the bill presented a separate principle for consideration. He could not agree, either, with the gentleman, that this bill is to be taken as it is; that it is not susceptible of amendment; that the committee which reported it possesses more intelligence than the whole House. He believed, on the contrary, there was in the House a great fund of practical information, which a debate upon the details of it would elicit. In his opinion, Mr. F. said, the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, were so connected, that they could not, without violence, be separated. In the proposition which he had made to amend the bill, by striking out the clause now under consideration, he had been actuated as much by a desire to favor agriculture, as to favor commerce. What would be the effect of it? He ought, he said, certainly to have brought into this House some experience, if nothing else; for he had been ten years of his life engaged in commerce, and, for the last ten years, in agricultural pursuits; and, practised in both, he was not hostile to either of them. Every barrel of flour exported to the United States, said Mr. F., the proceeds of which are invested in the products of foreign countries, for importation, brings into our Treasury at least fifteen dollars, in the shape of duties on the foreign importation. You will, by compelling the consumption of the article here, by excluding importations by high duties, produce a necessity for raising that fifteen dollars upon the consumption of the article at home. Here, then, is a taxation on agriculture, to an enormous extent, the necessity for which will be produced by your legislating to the extent proposed. It was upon general principles, therefore, he had proposed to strike out the clause of the bill now under consideration. The present rate of duty on spirits, he said, is vastly higher than the duty now proposed in the bill on any article whatever. If it was increased, Congress would be under the necessity of making up, by internal taxation, the deficiency of fifteen dollars on every barrel of flour, the exportation of which should be virtually forbidden, by the excessive taxation of the articles usually imported in return for it, &c.

Mr. TRIMBLE said, he rose not to enter into a discussion of the merits and principles of the bill, but merely to state facts. It had been said, repeatedly, in the course of the debate, that, to impose an additional duty, would have an effect to diminish the revenue. On this subject he had a statement to lay before the House, which would show that the operation of the duty would be very different from what gentlemen seemed to think. But, before he produced it, he deemed it best to state the general principle that would govern him in all his deliberations, and in the several votes he might be called on to give in the course of the discussion of this bill. It was this: that he considered no tariff as fair, unless its pressure was equal on all parts of the community. He did not mean to say that if a noxious article was found in general use, that such article was not a fair object for taxation—he would, on the contrary, tax vice, if he could, out of the community, but he concluded that, if gentlemen wished to have a tariff pass this House, they had come prepared to equalize its effects as far as possible. There was one other general idea which he wished to state on this matter. If the present confederacy had never taken place between the States, they would have possessed and retained the power of laying what taxes they pleased on the ingress and egress of commodities into and out of the bounds of each, and would, no doubt, have exercised that power in rendering the taxes on each other equal. But the Constitution, (which, he could show was nothing but a perpetual treaty,) prohibited to them this right of taxation, and it was now, therefore, the honest duty of Congress to make the pressure of the tariff as equal as possible, whether the tax was direct or indirect.

But to recur to facts. It was not true that the revenue, on imported spirits, had been diminished by the taxes imposed on it, from the commencement of the Government to the present time. Mr. Secretary Dallas had shown that the annual revenue on this article, from 1800 to 1816, was something less than two millions of dollars. But in that statement he included the great importations of 1803, '4, '5, '6, '7, which do not fairly enter into the average. But, taking the importations from 1803 to 1812, the average amount will be found to be six millions, and the duties on that amount two millions—leaving out the years 1803, '4, '5, and '6, the average on the balance is about four millions, and the revenue one million. So that the average revenue to 1816 is about two millions. In that year the new tariff was laid, and the average duties on imported spirits, from 1816 to the present year, is two millions.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Here Mr. Foot inquired whether the gentleman from Kentucky had deducted the years of the embargo and non-intercourse?

Mr. T. replied that he had not. He did not think it was a fair mode of obtaining an average to take all the lowest, and leave out the highest years, or to take all the highest and leave out the lowest. (He was glad to perceive, from the inquiry of the gentleman from Connecticut, that they were getting on terra firma again—he had no doubt all would proceed very well now.) Mr. T. here made some remarks to show that the diminution of the import of spirits, in late years, arose from the general derangement of business, and was not occasioned by the tariff of 1816, though that tariff might, in some degree, have contributed to it.

On one thing he was determined, that, so far as he was concerned, he would make the tariff fair and equal. The old tariff was so unequal, that he presumed no member was to be found who would venture to take his place on this floor and attempt a defence of it. He knew, indeed, that absolute equality was unattainable—they could not weigh out equality by dram and scruples, but must come as near it as possible.

Mr. TRACY again rose, and said, that, the more he reflected on the subject, the more he was satisfied, that, instead of striking out from the bill the clause now under consideration, the duty proposed by it was not as high as it ought to be, consistently with the other provisions of the bill. He was satisfied, he said, that it could be shown conclusively, that the same considerations which operated as inducements in regard to other articles of the bill, would operate equally in favor of the motion which he now proposed, which was, to strike out the proposed "fifteen per centum," and, in lieu thereof, insert "fifty per centum."

Mr. McDUFFIE, of South Carolina, said, that he felt himself bound, on every question of amendment, not to oppose it on the general principle of hostility to the bill, but to oppose or support it on the merits of the amendment proposed. What, then, he asked, is the principle on which the manufacturers of the country claimed protection? What is the principle on which, if at all, they need it? Not that they cannot stand a competition, on any terms, when fairly established, with the foreign manufacturers; for, if gentlemen admitted that any article of manufacture cannot stand in competition with the foreign article, that admission denied at once the policy of the prohibition of the foreign article. The only ground on which an increase of the tariff could be supported, was that of sustaining manufactures against superior advantages, from the improved machinery and more powerful capital of foreign manufactures, against competition, &c. Now, Mr. McD. asked, is not the manufactory of whiskey in this country carried to perfection? Is an extraordinary machinery, or very extensive capital, necessary to carry it on? It had already been shown, that this manufacture is now protected by a duty of two hundred per centum on its value. Was it pretended that any article, the manufacture of which is not protected by such a bounty, could be protected by any bounty whatever short of total prohibition?

The ground which he took in regard to this article, Mr. McDUFFIE said, was, that it is one which, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, should be a subject of taxation; and the ground he now took, in opposition to the motion of the gentleman from New York, would be, that it would have the effect, if it succeeded, to protect the article, whether of foreign or domestic manufacture, from any taxation whatever. What, he asked, would be the effect of the tax now proposed? Would it not operate to the exclusion of the foreign article altogether? He appealed to any man, acquainted with the course of commerce, for confirmation of the fact, which he now stated, that the duties already existing, have almost excluded this article; that the trade with the West Indies was almost destroyed by the duty as it now stands. Mr. McD. here made some statements to show that, with regard to the comparative amount of the importation of the article of distilled spirits, the change has, under the operation of the augmentation of duties upon it, been vast. From the year 1805 to the year 1808, he said, one-half of the revenue of the country had been derived from duties on the importation of articles of this description. For the four succeeding years, more than a third of the revenue had been derived from the same source. The statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the amount of revenue from this source in those years had been very little greater than, under increased duties, it had been in late years, might be literally correct; but gentlemen ought to make a comparative statement, to arrive at correct results from the facts. It was true that, in 1822, the amount of the revenue from this source was two millions of dollars. But, in the years 1805 to 1807, when the total revenue was but seven millions of dollars, the imposts on distilled spirits amounted to three, four, and three millions of dollars. The duty now existing amounted, in fact, almost to an exclusion of that article, and if the same proportional amount was now imported, as was in 1805, the revenue from this very article, taking into consideration the growth of our population and the subsequent increment of duty, ought to be at least ten millions, instead of two millions of dollars.

The article of manufacture now in question, Mr. McD. said, was not one requiring extraordinary machinery or capital to carry it on, nor was it one which it was necessary to encourage in a national view, such as the manufacture of woollens, &c., necessary for the clothing of troops, &c., in a state of war. The manufacture of whiskey was one which could be increased to any extent in case of emergency. It was an article which could not be brought within the principle on which domestic manufactures rightfully claim protection; and he trusted the House would not sustain the proposition to increase the duty upon it.

What, he asked, was the suggestion of the gentleman from New York? That, if you strike out one of the items of this bill, you must another, and another, and thus lose friends to the bill. I protest against this argument, said Mr. McD. Let every article stand on its own footing, and on that ground alone. Is it to be argued that you are to protect an article by additional duties, contrary to the interest of the community, merely, as the gentleman from Kentucky has it, to equalize the tariff? The tariff, Mr. McD. said, ought to be equal, to be sure; but, as a preliminary question, no article ought to be protected which does not deserve it—and a tariff ought not to be made up of justice and injustice.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

The gentleman had addressed himself to the esprit du corps in the House, and called upon it to take the bill as it is, or not at all. It was certainly asking of the House a very great portion of faith, to require them to take a bill, including three or four hundred items, just as it stands, without examination. Let it be taken up, said he, item by item, and thus discussed. It is by this sort of discussion only we can arrive at the truth. When it is ascertained what articles require protection, then let the whole be combined in one bill. Let us take up the items one by one at least, and sanction those only which merit our sanction. And, if we are to have a system injurious to particular parts of the country, let us have the consolation of knowing that it is adopted with an eye to the national interest, and for a national object.

There is a portion of this country, said Mr. McD.—a portion which I have the honor to represent—that, modify it as you will, must sustain from the passage of this bill vast and heavy pecuniary loss. But, regarding the general interests of the Union, if it can be shown that the proposed duties are connected with the independence, the power of the country, this consideration will always with them have great weight; and a system of protection of manufactures, tending to these objects, although it may bear heavier on them than on any others, will not be disapproved. But a system of a combination of particular interests, for the particular benefit of each, is one which will never receive their sanction.

Mr. McD. adverted to the article of indigo, on the importation of which the bill proposes an additional duty. He knew no part of the country, he said, that was at all interested in the culture of this article, but that which he in part represented. But, he said, nothing would appear more idle to the people of that country than a protection in the manufacture of indigo. They required no protection, he said, in the manufacture of any article. He trusted, therefore, that the attention of the Committee would be turned to the particular articles proposed to be protected, and decide upon them in reference to their respective merits.

Mr. McD. concluded by a reference to a declaration of the honorable Speaker, in which he understood him to say, that he was perfectly willing that an excise should be established to supply any deficiency which might be produced by this bill; he asked that gentleman if he would consent to introduce into this bill a provision for such an excise?

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) explained. If an equivalent was given by the exclusion of the foreign article, so as to give to our manufacturers the whole supply of the market, he would consent to a tax on the domestic article equal to that now derived from the same foreign article.

Mr. McDUFFIE rejoined, that, if on the manufacture of the domestic article was to be raised the amount of duty now collected from the foreign article, he could not conceive what the manufacturer could gain by such an arrangement.

Mr. MALLARY objected to the statement produced by Mr. TRIMBLE, as being unfortunate in the period selected. The inquiry, to be fair, should have been confined to an ordinary and settled state of public affairs, and not to a season of distress in which the country had no commerce at all. The period from 1803 to 1820, includes that of the embargo. But, even then, the amount of revenue from imported spirits was double what it is at present. The gentleman includes, in his average, the year 1806, in which year alone we imported twelve millions of gallons—but exclude this year, and the average will be nearly four millions. With all the embarrassments of the war, we imported nearly as much as we now do. The fair inference seemed to be, that the present duty is sufficiently high. As a friend of the bill, he wished to see as many causes of objection as possible removed from its details.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he could only explain, and then have done. His friend behind him thought his selection of a period for an average of the imports of spirits an unfortunate one. He thought the gentleman's selection an unlucky one. He compares one period of the greatest distress with another of the greatest prosperity—but I cannot consent to the fairness of such a proceeding. I think we ought to compare the most favorable with the most favorable periods, and the most depressed with the most depressed. This alone will be a fair ground for estimate and deduction. And on this principle, I think the fact will turn out to be, that the amount imported, instead of being diminished by the tariff, has been increased by it; for it will be found to be greater during the year 1816, and for four years immediately afterwards, than it was previously.

Mr. TRIMBLE made a number of other remarks in reply to the comparative views of Mr. McDUFFIE.

Mr. MALLARY, explained, in answer to Mr. TRIMBLE. He thought, that, for an average, a number of years ought to be taken in succession; but either all in peace, or all in a time of war. And if, when taken in a time of war, the average was greater than it was in a time of profound peace, what stronger argument was needed to show that the duties ought not to be increased?

Mr. TOL (Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, who had introduced the bill) rose, and said, that he was not so much opposed to the amendment as he was to the reasons advanced in support of it. Not one argument had been urged but what might be urged with equal propriety against the whole tariff. The objection is, you prevent importation—you cut off trade. Well, sir, and what is the object of the whole bill, but to protect home industry by preventing those importations which destroy it? Even the gentleman from South Carolina has urged the same objection. He tells us whiskey requires no machinery nor capital—no more do straw bonnets. Sir, I must protest against the mode of opposition which is pursued—if every member is to object to the bill the moment any of its provisions affect himself or his constituents, not only must this bill be given up at once, but domestic industry must be left without protection to the end of time.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. REED objected to the duty as calculated to produce frauds upon the revenue. There was no article on which the duties had so much been evaded, in Europe, as this very article of spirits. If the bill was to produce or encourage smuggling, he thought it of dangerous tendency. The statements of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TRIMBLE) had gone to confirm his fears. He tells us that the average amount, since 1816, is nearly the same as before that year. I am by no means sure that the actual importation has not increased, though the revenue remains stationary. It was on this point, Mr. R. said, that he wished most to be satisfied.

Mr. TRACY explained in reply to Mr. McDUFFIE. He did not wish to press any part of the bill without discussion, but to try the general question first, whether the House was disposed to lay duties at all for the protection of manufactures and agriculture—and, if this is settled in the affirmative, then go into the details of the bill, and consider them thoroughly, with a view to make its provisions as equal and as beneficial as possible. He thought the principle of the bill to be a new one—he meant the principle of taxing imports with the avowed view of protecting home industry. If the tariff was not to be a measure for revenue, but a measure for protection, it ought to go on the plan of excluding competition altogether. The argument of the gentleman from South Carolina, proved that at least some alteration ought to be made in the duty on foreign spirits. He has shown that it diminished importation without discouraging the use of spirits. If the tariff was intended for protection, the duty was too low—if it was intended for revenue, it was too high. He thought that, in whatever part of the tariff we depart from revenue, as the object, we ought, at once, to go the whole length of excluding the foreign article. As to the moral question, involved in the discussion, he should not touch it, as he was not sufficiently informed as to the moral operation of what had been done already.

Mr. HAMILTON said, he was aware that, at this hour, and after so much (he thought unnecessary) discussion on this clause of the bill, to listen to any further argument on the subject, would be almost as noxious as, at this hour of the day, to take a dose of domestic blue ruin. Yet, notwithstanding all that, he was determined to oppose this bill, step by step, throughout its whole progress. In the whole discussion gentlemen seemed never to have considered that a great deal of our happiness in this world, in relation to our animal wants, consisted in consumption; that a government was morally bound to provide for its people, by every means in its power, an abundant, salubrious, and tasteful subsistence; and that the species of gratification under consideration was not unworthy the estimate of a statesman, if the interests of the revenue were to be promoted, or no principle of morality impugned. For himself, he had not had much experience in tipping rum and whiskey; but he was sure that no man could taste both, and deny that one of them was not more tasteful than the other. It was the duty of Congress to provide for the people the better article. But it seemed the object of the gentleman from the West, to leave to the nation only Hobson's choice—whiskey or nothing. But whatever might be the claims of the domestic industry of the West on this subject, he thought the claims of Connecticut were equally strong. The rum of the West Indies, imported into Connecticut, was as much a product of the industry of that State, as the article of whiskey was of the State of Kentucky, for this rum was a value obtained in exchange for a commodity raised in Connecticut, or of some effort of its productive energies.

To lay a duty on the imported article, was to put a bounty on the domestic article. And the effect would be, that the surplus capital would go to making of whiskey, which would otherwise go to the raising of wheat and of animals. But to suppose that, in that case, the high price of whiskey would continue, was certainly fallacious—the price would fall, and the consequence would be, that we should only get five times the quantity of whiskey that we now have, without increasing the wealth of the country a single dollar. The honorable Speaker has told us that he will consent to an excise; it is quite competent for him to say so—but will the country go with him? He may call up spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come when he does call them? Lay an excise, and the consequence will be another change in your Government, perhaps another whiskey-surrection. The honorable chairman of the committee says, that if each member objects to that part of the bill which touches his own district, we shall have no bill at all; well, sir, that is just what we ought to have. Then we should have only a revenue bill, and an average tax of twenty-five per centum upon the trade of the country. In conclusion, Mr. H. observed, the gentleman from Kentucky has told us, that equality could not be measured out by drams and scruples. In reply I have only to assure him, that I entertain serious scruples in taking the dram he has prepared for us.

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, rose and said, he considered the duty proposed, as not so much intended for the benefit of the manufacturer of spirits as for the grower of grain. The gentleman from South Carolina says, that its object is not of a national character, but, if viewed in its operation on the farmers, it certainly has that character. The agriculturist has lost his market; his products are absolutely shut out from Europe; where he sold a thousand barrels of flour, he does not now sell one. And it is the duty of a protecting and parental government to provide a market for him, if it can be done. But, gentlemen exclaim; you will destroy commerce—how? By preventing us from importing spirits. As well might they tell us we ought to export grain, and import our bread, lest commerce should be unemployed, as to tell us we must export grain and import spirit for the sake of commerce. It is certainly as proper that a nation should import its bread, as import its drink. And it is quite as much the duty of Government to protect the man who raises the material for our drink, as the man who raises the material for our bread. The gentleman from South Carolina cannot comprehend how the country is to be a gainer, if the excise is made equal to the duty on imports—the difference is obvious. We in the one case keep our capital at home, and in the other we send it abroad; the difference is the whole price—which in the one case is sent out of the country, and in the other is kept within it. I very well remember that, in the district of country I have the honor to represent, there was paid during the late war a heavy excise—yet there was never known a period of such prosperity to the manufacturer of whiskey; there was twice as much made then as there is now. The interior labors under peculiar disadvantages. The products it raises are bulky and will not bear the cost of transportation to a distant market. Government ought to protect and cherish them at home, and provide a home market. There was such a market to a considerable extent in our manufacturing establishments, but these are crushed. During the war there were, in my district, from fifteen to twenty furnaces, besides forges, rolling and splitting mills, and other establishments for the manufacture of iron. In 1816 the duty was taken off from imported iron, and they were crushed. One after another sank, sank; they were all ruined—their hands were dismissed, and the agriculturist lost his market, while the manufacturer lost his all. You took that market from the farmer—it is your duty to restore it, or give him some equivalent. The gentleman from South Carolina was pleased to designate the spirit of our own domestic manufacture as blue ruin. Nothing will suit him but the spirit that is imported. He likes red ruin. Rum is, in his estimation far better colored, and far better tasted, than whiskey. Possibly he likes it because it is of a red color. But, sir, to my taste, old whiskey, the genuine old Columbia, is better than the gentleman's red ruin. There are some gentlemen who cannot bear any thing that is domestic. Call it foreign, and they approve it at once—but nothing that is domestic is good enough for their use. But, sir, if you look at the effects produced, I see no reason why red ruin is any better than blue ruin. If a man gets drunk I do not think it will make much difference, whether it is on foreign or on domestic spirits. If there is any difference, it is in the expense to his family, and that is all on the side of the domestic article.

The gentleman from South Carolina thinks it would be much better to raise animals, and send them to the eastward, than to occupy our capital in distilling whiskey. But, sir, I can tell the honorable gentleman that there is nothing better or more favorable to the raising of those animals which we of the West drive down to feed him and his neighbors, than distilleries. The duty in dispute I take to be for the protection of the farmer; and I ask, while our products are shut out of foreign markets, shall we go to those very markets for our meat and our drink?

Mr. WRIGHT observed, that the gentleman from South Carolina had stated it to be the duty of Government to provide for the people a beverage both salubrious and tasteful. If the object of legislation was to encourage drinking, this might be true; but as he had always understood it to be the duty of a wise legislator rather to discourage that habit, he could, by no means, assent to the tasteful proposition. He was not very conversant in the taste of rum and whiskey; but he thought that good old whiskey was better than either New England or West India rums. But gentlemen tell us that, if you distil spirits from grain, you divert the grain from being the sustenance of men. But he desired to know whether any gentleman, who used this argument, would undertake to say that there was any scarcity of breadstuffs in this country; and whether what was raised for distilling, was not so much added to the agricultural products required for sustenance? The object of the protecting duty is to give employment to a multitude of persons who are now idle, and whose families are in want of the necessaries, as well as the comforts of life; and I say that, if there is any article now imported, which ought to be excluded for this purpose, that article is foreign spirits. Is it not fair to give to our own people our own market? Shall you give a monopoly to the East, and give the West no equivalent? No man will assert that our grain-growing yeomanry (who, after all, are the country's strength, both in peace and war) are insufficient to supply all our wants both for meat and drink. I am in favor of the bill, and shall vote for the amendment to increase the duty.

It being now nearly four o'clock, a motion was made and carried that the Committee rise. It rose accordingly, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 13.

Mr. PLUMER, of New Hampshire, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill better to provide for taking evidence in the courts of the United States in certain cases; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Thomas Williams; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of George Harlin, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act authorizing the building of an additional number of sloops of war, for the naval service of the United States;" reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICH, from the Committee of Claims, also made a report on the petition of John Holliday, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MATSON, from the same committee, made a report on the petition of Nathaniel Jones, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. HEMPHILL, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, reported a bill authorizing the subscription of stock in the Delaware and Chesapeake Canal Company; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill providing for the appointment of two Indian agents in addition to those already provided for by law, and fixing their compensations, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the expediency of amending an act, providing for the examination of land titles in that part of Louisiana situated between the Rio Hondo and the river Sabine, so as to include all the neutral territory or disputed ground, between the United States and the late Government of Spain, in Mexico, situated in the western part of Louisiana, and to the east of the boundary line as established by the treaty of 1819, over which the land commissioners of the United States have heretofore exercised no jurisdiction, and to make such other alterations therein, as may be deemed expedient.

Resolved, That the same committee be directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the present land register at Opelousas, in Louisiana, to finish the business of the land office at Opelousas, left in an unfinished state by his predecessor, and that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to make a reasonable allowance therefor.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the propriety of allowing compensation to Zachariah C. Alvis, a private in Captain George Smith's company of Mounted Gunmen, in the campaign against the Creek Indians, for a horse which was lost for the want of forage.

The Committee on Roads and Canals were discharged from the consideration of the memorial of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council, of the city of Boston, and it was committed to the Committee on Commerce.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, viz: "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be made a military road from a point opposite to Fort St. Philip, to Johnson's Plantation, as an auxiliary to the defence of New Orleans;" "An act confirming the claim of Peter H. Hobart and Lewis Judson to a certain tract of land;" and, "An act extending the term of pensions granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds or casualties received while in the line of their duty, on board the private armed ships of the United States, during the late war;" in which bills the Senate ask the concurrence of this House.

Bills from the Senate, of the following titles, viz:

1. An act extending the term of pensions granted to persons disabled, and to the widows and orphans of those who have been slain, or who have died in consequence of wounds or casualties received while in the line of their duty on board the private armed ships of the United States during the late war;

2. An act authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be made a military road from a point opposite to Fort St. Philip, to Johnson's Plantation, as an auxiliary to the defence of New Orleans;

3. An act confirming the claim of Peter H. Hobart and Lewis Judson to a certain tract of land; were read twice, and referred, respectively, the 1st, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the 2d, to the Committee on Military Affairs; and the 3d, to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the election of a delegate from said District to represent the same in the Congress of the United States.

Objection being made to this resolution—

Mr. R. said it was very well known that the population of the District of Columbia is rapidly increasing, and that its commercial business, and with it the legislative wants of the people, are rapidly increasing. They have no Representative on this floor to express to the House their particular wants. Mr. R. said he could see no reason why the people of the District of Columbia should not be represented here in the same manner as other inhabitants of the United States. Petitions were frequently received from different parts of the District in favor of particular objects, and other petitions protesting against those objects. It was almost impossible, from the nature of things, that the Congress of the United States could, under present circumstances, have a fair expression of the wishes of the people of this District on the subjects, relating to its interests, which they were occasionally required to act upon. There was no mode by which this expression could be so well made, as by the people having it in their power to send a person here to represent their wants. A

Delegates sent here by them would necessarily have the voice of a majority of the people of the District in his favor, and would be able to express their wants more correctly than they could be readily ascertained in any other way.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, said he hoped the resolution would be agreed to, and that the people of the District would be allowed to have a Delegate on this floor. On the score of economy, to save the time of the House, and the money of the nation, if for no other reason, he considered this measure advisable.

Mr. A. STEVENSON, of Virginia, asked whether there had been any expression of the wishes of the people of the District in favor of this measure.

Mr. ROSS replied that he was not aware whether there had been any petition addressed to the House on this subject, but, in conversation with inhabitants of the District, he had frequently heard such a wish expressed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, observed that the Constitution provides that the exclusive legislation for the District of Columbia should be placed with Congress. He was averse from a proposal to relieve Congress from a part of that duty, by the election of a Delegate from that District. Such a Delegate would have no vote on the floor; he could only tell this House what the Committee on the affairs of that District every year now tell it. No petition from that District was submitted asking for this privilege; and he thought that this consideration alone was sufficient to show, not only why such a Delegate should not be chosen, but why Congress should not even direct an inquiry on the subject. Let us not, said Mr. T., of our own mere motion, attempt to throw off that responsibility which has been imposed upon us by the Constitution. For himself, he could say that, as a member of this House, he viewed himself as much the Representative of the District of Columbia, as of the district which had done him the honor to make him its Representative in this House, and he could, with truth, say, that he felt as much interest in its prosperity as in that of his own district; and he had no reason to doubt that other honorable gentlemen felt as he did. The most respectful attention had always been paid to representations coming from the inhabitants of this District. He believed that no just complaint had hitherto been neglected. He knew that they had occupied a large share of the time and attention of this House; even on the administration of justice, which was acknowledged to be the most defective part of the affairs of this District, much time had been spent, and great improvements had been made within a few years past. If the inhabitants shall think fit to send forward to this House a memorial on the subject, it will receive the most respectful attention. Until they did, he did not conceive it necessary to act upon it.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, said he presumed that the resolution, and what had been said upon it, would be sufficient to elicit the opinions of the people of the District upon it, and he, therefore, moved, for the present, to lay the resolve on the table.

Mr. NEALE, of Maryland, suggested that a memorial had recently been presented in this House, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, embracing a prayer for this, among other objects.

The question was then taken on the motion to lay the resolution on the table, and decided in the affirmative.

THE TARIFF BILL.

On motion of Mr. TON, the House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the several acts for imposing duties on imports, the immediate question, depending from yesterday, being upon the motion of Mr. TRACY, to strike out fifteen per centum, (the addition proposed upon the rate of duties now existing on the importation of distilled spirits,) and inserting in lieu thereof fifty per centum—

Mr. TOMLINSON, of Connecticut, rose, and said, that, having, on a preceding day, submitted to the Committee a few remarks on a motion, involving, as he thought, the principle now asserted by the mover and supporters of the motion under consideration, and those remarks having been particularly replied to by gentlemen who had followed him, a sense of duty impelled him again to ask the attention of the Committee, and fully and freely to express his views regarding the proposition immediately before them. Notwithstanding the views entertained by some gentlemen, he regarded it as a proposition which would vitally affect the commerce and agriculture of a considerable portion of the Union, and he regretted that, in the discussion of the amendment, the magnitude of the interests involved in it had not been properly appreciated. Yes, sir, said he, the interest of agriculture, the friend of which he professed to be, is intimately connected with this proposition, as he would hereafter show.

Mr. T. said, he was disposed to bring into the discussion, on the bill now before the Committee, a spirit of conciliation, and even of reasonable concession, but he could not so far indulge that spirit as to consent to an infringement of the interests of his constituents, who were engaged as well in agricultural as commercial pursuits. He had, indeed, been asked to sacrifice what he deemed the interests of the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, to a spirit of concord and good feeling; and to yield to the imposition of the additional duty proposed; but, when he considered that a measure proposed for the adoption of Congress would be detrimental to his constituents, he should, on all occasions, make it known, and stand, at least, as their watchful and faithful advocate. He hoped to be able to convince the Committee that the amendment now before them would be essentially injurious, not merely to his constituents, but to all the Eastern, and some of the Middle and Southern States, and thus to secure its rejection.

A gentleman from New York (Mr. TRACY) had said that the objection to his amendment comes with an ill grace from the Eastern States, and especially from Connecticut. Sir, said Mr. T., I profess to have some knowledge of the interests of the Eastern States, and I am not aware that those interests have been particularly consulted in the formation of the bill under consideration. The duty on hemp, surely, is not intended to protect the agriculture of that section of our country. Hemp is not raised there; the lands of New England are not suited to the culture of it. Are the interests of commerce to be promoted by the additional duty on hemp? Will not commerce feel the injurious effects of that tax in a two-fold respect? The expense of rigging ships is augmented by the very measure which will deprive them of employment. Little hemp is raised in the United States, except in Kentucky and the Western States. This fact shows whose interest will be subserved by the proposed protecting duty on hemp. Is the duty imposed on lead for the benefit of the Eastern States? It will not be pretended that there is a lead mine east of the Alleghany mountains. This tax, then, must regard exclusively the interest of the Western States. Mr. T. said he might advert to the duty on glass and iron, further to sustain his position. The additional duty of thirty-five per cent. upon wool would be more general in its operation, but it certainly could not be concealed that wool could be most cheaply raised in the Western States, where the price of land was far below its value in New England. Indeed, he had been told, by a member of this House, that, from the single town of Steubenville, in Ohio, during the last year, sixty thousand pounds of wool had been transported over the Alleghany. Where, then, will the additional duty on wool be most beneficially felt? He was not adverse to such encouragement of the interests of the West, but he insisted that, while those interests are thus protected an important source of wealth to the East should not be destroyed. He deemed it proper thus to repel the assertions, repeated more than once, that the bill before the Committee contains provisions peculiarly beneficial to Connecticut and New England, and he did it in no invidious spirit towards the West. He certainly rejoiced in the prosperity of that country, and was ready to promote it by all legitimate and proper measures. His constituents, Mr. T. said, asked for national measures, and required nothing inconsistent with the interest of the Union, and, as their representative, he was disposed to insist upon the just and equal distribution, as well of the public patronage as the public burdens.

The objection, Mr. T. said, which, in his judgment, was conclusive against the additional duty proposed, was, that it would greatly diminish, if not annihilate, the West India trade.

It certainly would prevent the legal importation of foreign distilled spirits from the West India islands. Indeed, he apprehended that the addition recommended by the committee would fall little short of immediately producing the same result, but that such would be its ultimate effect he felt persuaded.

He would, he said, examine the nature and extent of this trade; and in doing so he proposed to enter into details which perhaps might be uninteresting, but he thought could not fail to be useful in the investigation of a measure like that now before the Committee. The bill under consideration purports to be, and bears the title of, a bill to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports. Certainly, in adjusting the numerous provisions of such a bill, the commerce of the nation ought to be brought distinctly into view, with all its ramifications and effects upon the other interests of the country. The trade with the West Indies had always been deemed of immense importance to the United States. It was a profitable trade, affording a large balance in our favor. The exports to the West India islands consist mainly of the productions of this country, for which we can find no other market. It may be useful to state a few facts in relation to this trade, which is by some gentlemen so lightly considered. The most important articles of export to those islands, of domestic produce and manufacture, are lumber, fish, the various kinds of animal food, corn, cornmeal, and flour. The flour exported to those islands in 1822 was valued at the custom-house at two millions seven hundred and fifty-eight thousand four hundred and twenty-seven dollars; more than one-half of all the flour exported from the country. The total amount of domestic exports to those islands in 1822 exceeded $10,070,000, and the exports of foreign growth and manufacture exceeded $2,390,000, making an aggregate of exports exceeding $12,470,000. The bullion imported from the same islands in 1822 amounted to $297,191, and the gold and silver coin to $1,150,932, it being almost one-half of all the specie imported during that year. Ought such a trade to be disregarded? Ought it not to be encouraged, especially when it is remembered that it is carried on in the pork, the beef, the lumber, and bread-stuffs of the country, for which no demand exists in Europe? This trade, too, furnishes us with large quantities of colonial produce, which may be carried to a European market, and thus ultimately enriching the country by a double profit and freight. But this trade, Mr. T. said, had in fact languished under the operation of the duty imposed in 1816; and, so far from being able to sustain further pressure, seemed to require the fostering care of the National Government.

The importance of preserving the principal market which remained to the country for the productions that he had named would be apparent by adverting to the great difference in the quantity of those articles exported in the year 1804 and in the year 1822. He had taken the year 1822, because the report of the exports in the year 1823 was not conveniently accessible, it not having yet been printed. The value of lumber exported in 1804 was $2,548,000. The value of the same article exported in 1822 sunk to $1,307,670. The animal food and animals exported in 1804 were valued at $4,284,568. The exports of the same articles in 1822 were diminished to the comparatively small amount of $1,463,928. He had taken these articles as fairly exhibiting the depression which this branch of our commerce has experienced within the period of eighteen years.

But the diminution of exports to which he had called the attention of the Committee fell not alone upon the commerce of the Eastern States; it was, perhaps, equally destructive to the agricultural prosperity of that section of the Union. Indeed, the lumber of the States of North Carolina and Georgia must find the same market, or be lost to its owners. And the State of New York, from which the gentleman comes who made the motion now under consideration, must look to the West India market to dispose of the lumber which shall float down their northern and western canals. Deprive them of this market, and their timber must be burned on the spot where it grew, or their forests remain uncleared.

It has been insisted, Mr. T. said, that the argument which he had urged against the proposed increase of duty on distilled spirits applied equally to every part of the present bill, and would prove that no augmentation of the present duties on imports ought to take place. This argument, he said, he must be permitted to pronounce unsound, notwithstanding the high source from which it proceeded. The trade to the West Indies is of a peculiar description. It consists of bulky articles, and employs a greater quantity of tonnage, and a larger number of men, in proportion to the capital employed, than any other portion of the trade in which the merchants of the United States are engaged. Our true policy is to give protection to the domestic manufacture of those foreign fabrics, the importation of which affords employment to the smallest portion of our navigation, and which cannot be paid for in the domestic produce of the country. If it be necessary to abandon any part of your commerce for the protection of domestic industry, first abandon that which drains the country of specie, but, last of all, that which returns specie for the surplus of your bulky domestic produce.

The honorable chairman of the committee who reported this bill has urged that the objection raised against the proposed increase of duty applies with equal force to the increased duty on grass bonnets. Perhaps no instance will better elucidate the propriety of the policy for which he contended than the one mentioned by that gentleman. The bonnets referred to, on the importation of which an additional duty is imposed, are brought chiefly from Italy, and fabricated of a light material. The domestic produce exported to Italy and Malta amounts to only $560,714, and that consists of articles which cannot be obtained as well elsewhere, and for which specie will be paid if we consent to diminish the amount of our imports from that country, now exceeding $1,560,000, by the domestic manufacture of an article of dress, the cost which, in the year 1822, in that country, was $610,228.

Now, sir, said Mr. T., is it not apparent that the trade which I advocate and wish to sustain, bears no analogy to that mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania? While the former is beneficial to both the agricultural and commercial interests of the country, those important interests are not materially advanced by the latter.

But it has been said, by the honorable Speaker, that, if the merchant refuses to receive, for his cargo, distilled spirits, he will be paid in something better. This is an entire mistake. Will the sagacious American merchant, of choice, take an article in payment on which he must sustain a certain loss? But the merchants tell you that the amount of duty, cost, and regular charges, on spirits imported, considerably exceeds the price of this article in our market. The fact is not as the honorable Speaker supposes. The article in question is not taken, except when nothing better can be obtained. If the avails of the outward cargo could be received in any other article, the American merchants certainly are not so short-sighted as to prefer taking that which subjects them to a certain loss. But, sir, so far from giving something better than distilled spirits for our domestic produce, the inhabitants of those islands will seek the supplies elsewhere which they have been accustomed to receive from the United States. Black cattle abound in South America, and from that country may be drawn supplies for the West Indies. The timber of Canada will find its way to that market, from which the proposed measure goes to exclude us, and the distilled spirits, which will be received in return, may be transported to Canada, where its introduction into the United States, without the payment of duty, is easy, and attended with little hazard. The transactions of the late war are not forgotten. It is well understood that, towards the close of that war, foreign distilled spirits were abundant on that frontier. This may again occur, if, by augmenting the duty, you present an inducement sufficiently strong to prostrate the integrity of those engaged in this trade. It cannot be concealed that excessive duties lead to smuggling, and this will not only diminish the revenue, but impair, seriously impair, the morality of the country. Information received from an honorable member of this Committee, supports the opinion that the payment of the present duty is evaded by the introduction of foreign distilled spirits, through the channel which has been mentioned. If brandy is constantly smuggled into England, and in large quantities, from France, is it not extremely probable that the same course will be adopted, in a country affording altogether greater facilities for the violation of the revenue laws?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. STEWART) has defended, said Mr. T., this additional duty, not so much on the ground that it is intended as an encouragement to the manufacture of domestic spirits, as for the promotion of agriculture. The grain-growing portion of our country, the gentleman told us, needed this protection. Sir, what is the protection your laws now afford to the manufacturer of whiskey? The average amount of duty on foreign distilled spirits may be stated at forty-two cents per gallon. The average cost, in the West Indies, will probably not exceed twenty cents per gallon. You have, then, a duty on foreign spirits of more than two hundred per cent. Ought not the gentleman to be satisfied with this protection of his whiskey? Will he, indeed, insist on adding fifty per cent. to the present duty on imported spirits, while on whiskey no duty is imposed? But this additional duty is not necessary to protect the grain of the West. The existing laws have gradually diminished the importations of foreign spirits. Notwithstanding the population of this country has nearly doubled within the last twenty years, the quantity of spirits imported has diminished more than 2,300,000 gallons. The diminution of the importations being in an inverse proportion to the augmentation of our population, it is easy to see that the manufacturer of whiskey, and he who raises the grain to be converted into this deleterious liquor, have experienced a constantly increasing encouragement. The consumers have increased, in the period of twenty years, about four-fifths, and the foreign supply has diminished about one-third.

The average quantity of spirits imported and consumed in the country, from 1801 to 1810, inclusive, was 6,834,878 gallons. An accurate author has estimated the quantity of spirits distilled from grain and fruit, in 1801, at ten millions of gallons. By the returns of the marshals, in 1810, it appears that the amount distilled, from foreign and domestic materials, in that year, was 25,499,382 gallons; making the quantity of spirits consumed in that year, 31,725,417 gallons. If it be admitted, then, that the increase of the quantity of spirits consumed in the country has been in proportion to the augmentation of our population, and that our population has increased, since 1810, only one-third, it follows that 42,300,556 gallons of distilled spirits are annually consumed in the United States. Deducting from this enormous quantity, 4,567,744 gallons imported, and there will remain, distilled in the United States, 37,732,812 gallons. Is not this adequate encouragement? Will not the gentleman from Pennsylvania stop short of a total exclusion of foreign spirits? The experience of the past justifies the conclusion that the existing duty is rapidly producing this result.

The chairman of the Committee on Manufactures told this Committee that one object of the bill under consideration was to provide a revenue. This, sir, is a proper object; the bill ought to be so framed, as, by a judicious addition of duties on some articles, to provide for any diminution which may result from the encouragement properly afforded, to the manufacturer of other articles. In the year 1822, the duty paid on foreign distilled spirits imported into the United States exceeded two millions and forty thousand dollars. If you impose a duty, which shall amount to a prohibition, how, Mr. T. asked, is this deficiency to be supplied? The Government must be supported. The national debt must be paid; the pledged faith of the country redeemed. Although we have a large balance in the Treasury, yet we are told that, in order to meet the payment of that portion of the public debt which will become payable in 1825, it will be necessary to borrow about one million of dollars. Will you render it necessary to borrow two millions more?

Mr. Chairman, adopt the amendment now before the Committee; exclude foreign distilled spirits, and we present an anomaly in our revenue system. We exclude foreign, and impose no duty on domestic, spirits. An article of luxury, considered in all countries as a fit subject and a fruitful source of revenue, is exempted from taxation, while we raise about $700,000 from salt, a necessary of life. Can the gentleman from New York be serious in advocating a measure fraught with such unjust and ruinous results?

If it is determined that the duty on foreign spirits shall amount to a prohibition, I ask gentlemen to give to the country a duty on the domestic article. Let not the revenue which may be legitimately drawn from this source be lost. If this destroyer of the physical energies, and the morality and happiness of its votaries, must be permitted to continue its ravages upon society, do not the principles of sound policy dictate that it be made to contribute largely to the national revenue? If, said Mr. T., gentlemen will propose a tax of 20 cents per gallon on whiskey—call it an excise if you please, he cared not for the name—it should have his cordial approbation and support; and to effect an object of such moral and national interest, he would give his assent to the imposition of a duty on foreign spirits, which should afford adequate protection to the domestic manufacture. The imposition of such a tax, if the distilled spirits consumed in the country be estimated at forty millions of gallons, would produce an annual revenue of about eight millions of dollars. With such a revenue we might afford complete protection to all the valuable manufacturing establishments in the country, and secure an ample supply of all those manufactured articles which essentially contribute to our security and independence.

Mr. T. said he had deemed it his duty to explain to the Committee the views which he entertained regarding the proposition before it, and he could say that it was his wish to consult, not merely the interest of manufactures, but of agriculture and commerce. Those interests were closely and intimately interwoven. They are the joint sources of the national wealth, and great care is requisite that they do not come in collision.

He concluded by expressing a hope that the details of the bill would be so arranged as to do justice and afford satisfaction to all classes of the community, and to every section of the Union.

The question was then taken on Mr. Tracy's motion, and decided in the negative by a large majority.

The question then recurred on the motion of Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, to strike out the whole of the clause proposing an increase of duty on the importation of distilled spirits; and, being taken, was decided in the negative—102 votes to 67.

Mr. GARNETT, of Virginia, moved to strike out of the bill the clause in the following words, viz: "On oranges, fifty cents per hundred; on lemons, twenty-five cents per hundred; on limes, ten cents per hundred." In support of this motion—

FEBRUARY, 1824

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. GARNETT said, that, while this bill was alarmingly comprehensive in some respects, it was singularly, not to say ludicrously, minute in others. Of the latter description were the duties proposed to be stricken out; and there was even a duty proposed on filberts and figs! He presumed the duty on limes and lemons was introduced on the same principle with that on foreign spirits, and proposed to operate by the same means—by discouraging the manufacture of punch, and promoting that of whiskey. The duty on oranges, he supposed, was for the benefit of the agriculture of Florida. He wished Florida had a voice in this House. He would undertake to say, that, if she had, though an infant in the Union, she would not be tempted by this bait of an orange to gulp down the nauseous compound of ingredients offered by this bill. It would scarcely take out the bad taste. There was another duty intended for the benefit of Florida; the duty on figs. He would venture to say, she would not give a fig for the duty. Oranges and lemons were refreshing and useful in sickness. A tax on them was a tax on the sick. If we did lay taxes in reference to the sick, let it be for their benefit—let us tax some of those deadly weapons and direful drugs which, for the last thirty years, have been so fatal to the sick in this country. He would support the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, in a tax on lancets, and he would vote for a tax on calomel, though it produced a general constipation, from the Passamaquoddy to the Pedee. He thought this bill was sour enough, in all conscience, without squeezing these lemons into it.

Mr. TON, of Pennsylvania, said, that the duties proposed to be stricken out were not higher than the present ad valorem duties on the same articles. The object of the committee was not that which the gentleman from Virginia supposed, to encourage the home manufacture of these articles, but to make the collection of the revenue certain, easy, and free from evasions. It was wholly unessential for the objects of this bill whether the amendment now proposed was agreed to or not, but he thought the gentleman had not given any sufficient reason for the amendment. The importation of figs, Mr. T. said, was very great, indeed; the article was already charged with a specific duty, and, if it were not, it certainly ought to be. Articles of this description are imported almost wholly for the use of the rich and luxurious, and were certainly fair objects of taxation.

Mr. GARNETT said, his reason for making this motion was to take away from the supporters of the bill any claim which might be founded on this item, in favor of the duties on other articles. He was perfectly satisfied, from his observation, that the very delusive idea that agriculture has been benefited by protecting duties, has been a strong motive with many for pushing that system of protection to the extent now proposed in favor of manufactures; and, indeed, if he was not mistaken, the gentleman from Pennsylvania had stated it, the other day, as one of the objects of this bill, to equalize the protection afforded by law to the two interests. For his part, Mr. G. said, he would, if he could, repeal all the duties on agricultural products; and, in relation to such a proposition, he believed, the greater part of the agriculturists in this House would go along with him. For, he said, in regard to the great staples of the country, it was not in the power of this House, by any act of legislation, to increase the price of them, inasmuch as the price must be regulated by the portion of them which goes abroad, and not by any other circumstance. We have attracted a great deal of public notice, said Mr. G., by attempting to legislate on many curious subjects, such as the flying machine, &c., but the spectacle of a legislature gravely legislating to raise the price of corn, or any other great product of the soil, is calculated to excite, in the minds of intelligent men, more astonishment than any of the projects to which I refer. Such an undertaking is as wise as that of the philosopher who undertook to extract sunbeams from cucumbers, or as any other absurdity that can be conceived of.

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, was very glad to hear from the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that he had an affectionate regard for the revenue of the country, which, however, he might have manifested more effectually than by attaching it to such insignificant articles as pine apples, oranges, and filberts! But this item was consistent with the whole scope and object of the bill. If the bill ever becomes a law, said Mr. H., and goes into operation—if we ever submit to its operation—it will be of very little consequence whether oranges, figs, or filberts, be interdicted or not: for I believe there will, under the operation of this system, be very few individuals left who can afford to purchase them. As it is, fifty cents per hundred on oranges would operate as a duty of a hundred per cent. on the article, but even at this rate would be of no importance to the Treasury, &c. For what purpose are we legislating? said Mr. H. Is this item thrown out as a bait to catch a part of the Southern country? In a portion of the district which I represent, a great quantity of oranges are grown; but I repudiate the idea for my constituents, of such an inducement having any influence on their minds. I specially protest against the duty, if intended for our use. Mr. H. made some observations on the merits of these particular articles composing this item, and concluded by saying that he was glad that such items had been stuffed into the bill, to make it still more odious and more oppressive than it would be without them.

Mr. TON remarked, that, as he supposed the gentleman would vote against the amendment because he was glad that the proposed duty was odious, no further argument was necessary from him (Mr. TON) to convince that gentleman that the amendment was inexpedient.

The question was then taken on Mr. GARNETT'S motion, and decided in the negative.

Mr. CONNER, of North Carolina, then moved to strike out, in the ninth line, the word thirty, and insert twenty-five, which would make the clause read, "On all manufactures of wool, or of which wool shall be a component part, a duty of twenty-five per centum ad valorem."

Mr. CONNER observed, on making this motion, that, from the committee having proposed thirty per centum on woollen goods, it was evidently their intention to prohibit coarse fabrics of woollen altogether. He could not approve of such a policy, which would operate oppressively on the Southern country generally. These goods were necessary to a large class of the people, and a very considerable revenue was derived from their importation, which, if the duty passed as now proposed, must be almost entirely lost to the Government.

The question being put on Mr. CONNER's amendment, it was lost—ayes 71, noes 106.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, then moved to amend the bill, by striking out the clause which proposes to lay a duty of six cents per square yard on all cotton bagging imported.

Mr. BRENT stated to the Committee his reasons for proposing this amendment. This duty, he said, would bear with particular hardship on the part of the country which he represented, and the more so, because it was allowed that it would have the effect of a prohibitory duty. He wished, when proposing such a duty as this, the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures would have shown that the article of cotton bagging was manufactured in the United States to a sufficient amount for the consumption of the country. This could not be shown; and, connected with that fact, this one feature showed the extent to which gentlemen were disposed to push their system.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania was mistaken in his assumed fact, that, during the late war, the cotton planters were supplied with bagging from Kentucky—for that State was not at that time making one-sixth part of the quantity necessary for the supply of the country. When we had no commerce, whatever, and Kentucky was almost without competition in the manufacture of the article, the greatest quantity of bagging which she made in any one year, was six hundred and thirty thousand yards, whilst the consumption of the United States amounts to upwards of four millions of yards, annually, &c. At this very moment, Mr. B. said, there is not made in the State of Kentucky, sixty thousand yards annually of cotton bagging. This fact appeared by the census of the State of Kentucky, in the year 1822, and the report, in regard to that manufacture, was, that it was in a languishing condition—not, Mr. B. said, from the want of protection to the manufacture, but from the inferiority of the article manufactured. I, said he, represent a cotton country; and all the gentlemen representing the same description of country will unite in testifying that the bagging of Kentucky is of so inferior a quality that we prefer paying forty cents per yard for the foreign article, to making use of the bagging of Kentucky, at twenty-five cents per yard. And would the advocates of this bill force upon the cotton growers an article of this inferior quality?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had referred to the report of Alexander Hamilton. Now, Mr. B. said, though he was not disposed to adopt the principles of Alexander Hamilton on any subject, he was willing to show, from his report, that Alexander Hamilton had laid down the principle, that a prohibition of the importation of any article should never be attempted by a Government without first ascertaining that the country can manufacture enough for its consumption, and, secondly, that the manufacture thereof is in a sufficient number of hands to insure competition. He called upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania to show that there were facts in the present case, and, if that could be established, he for one, would vote in favor of the proposed duty, if the article could be manufactured of a quality any thing like equal to the foreign article. Mr. B. said he had no attachment to foreign manufactures, or to foreign interests, as had been rather ungenerously suggested in debate yesterday. There was no member on this floor who was actuated by considerations of that kind. The opponents of this bill upon principle were as much attached to American productions as the gentleman who made the remark, and had shown it on all occasions in defence of the interests and rights of the country. Mr. B. said he did not like these allusions, and he hoped that, in the future discussion of this bill, they would be avoided.

Mr. B. said he would not now make any observations on the general principle of this bill. He had many reasons, which perhaps in time he might present to the House, to show the evil consequences of this bill, and that it ought not to pass in any shape whatever.

Mr. T. said it must be admitted that cotton bagging was an article indispensable to cotton planters, and that, if a supply of it cannot be furnished by the manufacture of our own country, the duty either ought not to be agreed to, or the time, in which it is to operate, ought to be extended. But, Mr. T. said, it would not do to say to this House that the States of Kentucky and Ohio could not make all the cotton bagging wanted for all the cotton-growing States in the Union; for, he said, it was easier to make bagging for a million pounds of cotton, than it was to raise ten thousand pounds of cotton. Mr. T. said he knew very well that this additional duty would oblige the constituents of the gentleman to pay more for their bagging than they now pay. If for this they had no equivalent, the duty would be unjust, and a hardship upon them. The question, however, was, have they not already an equivalent? Mr. T. contended that they have. The consumption of cotton, by the people of the United States, is to the amount of one-third of the whole quantity raised in the country. The greater part of this consumption of cotton is by the people who do not raise any of the article. It was notorious that there was more cotton consumed in the State of Pennsylvania than in all the States that raise cotton in the Union; and they pay a protecting duty to those who raise the cotton, of three cents per pound, which, it would be agreed, was in fact a bounty of so much upon the production of the article; because we know, said he, that it can be afforded to be raised in South America, and in some parts of the West Indies, at three cents per pound cheaper than in the United States because the slaves in that country were treated with greater severity than in this, harder worked, and more scantily clothed and poorly fed. At any rate, those countries can undersell our cotton growers. For their protection, however, said Mr. T., we have laid a duty of three cents per pound on the importation of foreign cotton, which, I trust, will ever continue to be laid; and thus the people of the State of Pennsylvania and of other States, for every pound of cotton they consume, pay a bounty of three cents to the people of the South. And, doing this, they now asked of the people of the South to repay about a hundredth part of this bounty in the shape of a duty on cotton bagging. This the gentleman from Louisiana considered a hardship—Mr. T. could not consider it so; it was a mere reciprocity. It was an exertion of the power conferred on Government for the purpose of compelling different sections of the country to do justice, in some degree, to one another, by reciprocating advantages in their intercourse, &c. If any part of the country required protection of this sort, it was the State of Kentucky. All the produce which that State can send to market was not of one-fifth the value of the exports of domestic produce from Georgia, or from South Carolina. Yet Kentucky is superior in numbers, and in physical and moral strength. Why should we, by the effect of legislation, give to one part of the country so decided an advantage over the other? In consequence of the disadvantages under which the West labored in respect to its products, there had been great distress and depression in the State of Kentucky. Specie was almost unknown in the State. So much was this the case, that, no long time ago, application was proposed to be made to the General Government to dispense with specie in the payment of the postage on their letters. They have not the same advantages as the citizens of Georgia and South Carolina, and Louisiana, and Alabama, and Mississippi; that is, they have no fellow-citizens whom they can compel to become customers to them, as they are to the cotton growers. From these and other considerations, Mr. T. was clearly for giving this encouragement to the manufactures of the West.

Mr. CROWNINSHIELD, of Massachusetts, said he thought the gentleman from Pennsylvania was totally mistaken in regard to the matter of fact, when he stated that a duty of three cents per pound is imposed as a protecting duty on cotton, because cotton could be raised in South America, the West Indies, &c., cheaper than here. The cotton of Bombay and Bengal might perhaps be as cheap as ours, but it was well known to be inferior in quality to ours. Mr. C. asserted that, with the exception of those countries, there is no country from which cotton can be imported so cheap as it is raised here, by three cents per pound. The gentleman's reasonings, founded on a contrary supposition, therefore, must go for nothing; and he was at liberty to make what use he pleased of the information now given.

Mr. TOD, referring to documents before him, said that, in one of the countries from which the greatest importation of cotton by the merchants had been made, the article was purchased at less than ten cents per pound. It did not at the time sell, in any part of this country, within three cents of ten cents per pound.

Mr. HAMILTON said, the argument of the gentleman from Pennsylvania was perfectly consistent with the whole scope of this bill; that if, by the laws of God and nature any part of our country should not enjoy equal advantages of soil, climate, &c., with another, Congress was to exert a despotie power with a view to equalize the advantages. Mr. H. said, he left it to the Committee to say, whether this was not the substance of the gentleman's argument.

The gentleman had informed the House there was no specie in the State of Kentucky; and, said Mr. H., is it possible that South Carolina is to be taxed till specie flows redundantly into Kentucky, and Kentucky is made able to supply us with our cotton bagging?

Mr. H. adverted to the practical operation of the item now proposed to be stricken out. We are to be taxed by it, said he—how much? Why, for the benefit of Kentucky, we are to be taxed, in round numbers, sixty thousand dollars a year in the small State which I represent. And we are now told that, as an equivalent for all this, we have received a bounty in the shape of a duty of three cents per pound on our cotton. This duty, Mr. H. said, never was laid for encouragement. It was laid for the purpose of revenue; and, to show how far that great man, Alexander Hamilton, was mistaken, he, in his report, doubted very much whether this country would ever have the capacity to raise a sufficiency of the article for the purposes of our own manufactures. How completely had this prediction been falsified! We raise it, not only in the greatest quantity, but of the most superior quality; the finest cotton in the world is raised, to threefold the amount of the consumption of our country. With regard to foreign cottons, which it was supposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, might compete with ours, we know perfectly well that, even in the Liverpool market, the Government of Great Britain having every inducement to encourage the East India trade, those cottons cannot enter into competition with ours. An attempt was made, some years ago, to introduce East India cotton into this country; merchants of great skill and experience were said to have lost half a million of dollars in the attempt. The rivalry of foreign cotton in this market with ours, was a mere bugbear, not entitled to a moment's consideration.

Look at the operation of this proposed duty, said Mr. H. We are to pay a tribute of sixty thousand dollars a year to Kentucky, to enable her to manufacture bagging. If we go on in this way with every article of our present import, what inducements do we leave to Great Britain to take our cotton? There are immense markets open to her, where she can obtain cotton in exchange for her manufactures if we reject them. Brazil alone is capable of producing as much cotton as the whole United States proper; and, he argued, if we take away the inducement which Great Britain has to receive our cotton, we shall in the end lose her custom, &c.

Mr. H. said, he would abstain from entering at present upon a discussion of the general principles of the bill. When the bill should be presented for discussion, on its general principle, he should make it his particular province to point out the many objections to it, and the character of the crusade about to be waged against the interests of that part of the country which he had the honor to represent.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, referring to an expression used by Mr. HAMILTON, in the close of his remarks, said he was gratified that the House was to have a revelation on this subject. He had no doubt it would have a happy effect on the minds of those gentlemen who were opposed to the bill; for it appeared that nothing but revelation would have any effect upon them.

If all this idea of the competition of foreign cottons was a bugbear, Mr. T. said he should like to know why that gentleman and others had been so anxious to tax East India cotton goods, if it was not for the purpose of excluding East India cotton itself. For the confirmation of the fact, Mr. T. said he appealed to the arguments which were used when the tariff was made up, and the gentlemen from the South asked for this protection for their cotton. [Mr. T. here said, he was very willing to yield the floor to the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) who seemed to feel the effect of the revelation which had been spoken of.] As to the Western country, Mr. T. continued, it enjoyed the advantage of no protecting duty on any article. But, when the gentlemen from the South send us their protected cotton, said Mr. T., it comes to us wrapt up in Inverness and Dundee bagging, made of the refuse tow, after the best of the hemp is hacked out. Now, sir, the Western hemp has been ascertained, by fair experiment, to be ten per cent. stronger than the Russian hemp; and from that fact, I presume we can make bagging, or any thing else, of Kentucky hemp, as strong as can be made from Russian hemp. Notwithstanding which, when we purchase cotton from the South, we are compelled to purchase this Inverness and Dundee bagging. Is there any equality in that? Notwithstanding which, said Mr. T., we do not ask an exclusion of this article, as they have done in relation to coarse cotton goods, but only a reasonable tax upon it. Nothing could be more fair, more equal, nor, he thought gentlemen would after due consideration allow, more just, than such a tax.

Have we not land enough, said Mr. T., to raise hemp sufficient to make all our cotton bagging? The land between the Ohio and Kentucky rivers is sufficient to make twice the quantity necessary for our consumption. We not only furnished the planters in Louisiana during the late war with cotton bagging—at a very high price, I admit—but they could not get it from any other country. We furnished them bagging to bale their cotton at New Orleans—and we did another thing: when it was baled, we stood behind it and defended it. I wish to know from the gentleman from Louisiana, why we are to protect their sugar by high duties, and then to go there and protect them and their cotton too.

Mr. T. accounted for the decline of the manufacture of bagging in Kentucky, caused by the low price of the foreign article, by the circumstance that, during the war, Russia exported vast quantities of hemp, and England, with an extensive navy then in actual service, had use for it. When the peace came, a great quantity of the article remained on hand, and was sold by the merchants at a low price to the manufacturers, who made it up into bagging, &c., and furnished it much cheaper than formerly. But that is now all worked up; and last year a tolerably high price was given for bagging.

So abundant was hemp in the Western country, that if we impose only such duty as will give the farmer a fair minimum price, the farmers there will keep down the maximum to the minimum nearly; and Mr. T. pledged himself that the manufacturers of the West would supply the whole country with bagging at not exceeding twenty-two and a half cents per yard, if Congress would grant them protection, and that they would keep it down to that price. But, by laying a proper duty, the market must first be made steady in its character, so that the foreigner cannot destroy the hemp grower and the manufacturer both, by excessive importations, &c. Bagging would be sold cheaper, so soon as hemp was allowed the same protection as was given to the Southern cotton, &c., as the prices of coarse cottons had been lowered since higher duties had been laid on the foreign article, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, said, he had not intended to touch the details of the bill; not, at least, until the general question was settled, and upon that he should offer his objections to the principles of the bill: the object of which was prohibition. He, however, felt called upon by the gentleman from Kentucky; and, although not inspired, as had been intimated, he would answer the argument of reciprocal justice, which had been urged, to sustain the duty proposed on cotton bagging.

We had been told, that the agricultural interest of the South had been protected by duties, and that we must now legislate on the basis of reciprocity. This argument, according to the unhappy fashion of the times, is designed to excite our sectional prejudices and jealousies. Mr. C. did not, for a moment, impute such a purpose to the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) nor to the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures; but he feared it had been used by others, for such an object. The argument is, however, utterly destitute of foundation; and, although its purpose is grave enough for reason—its texture is too light for any weapon but ridicule. Where was the intelligence of the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, when he told us that a duty was imposed for the protection of the cotton of the South? Did he not recollect that there was not a pod of cotton in the country at that period; and that the enlightened Secretary of that day never dreamt there would be? Where was his intelligence, when he informed us that the tobacco of Virginia had been protected? In our simplicity, we had always supposed that this article was a staple of the country, from the earliest settlement of the colonies; but we are happy to see that celebrated slander upon our great-grandmothers, blotted out from the page of history; we are happy to find that they were not bartered for this vile weed; we are happy to hear from such learned authority, from the gentleman who superintends our national industry, that our tobacco plant has only flourished since 1790, under the salutary protection of Congress! But our admiration reaches its altitude, when we come to the duty on sugar. This duty had, before 1800, reached two and a half cents; it is now but three. We always thought Louisiana had belonged to Spain—then to France. It appears singular how this duty could have been proposed for the protection of French and Spanish planters. But what's this difficulty to our modern logicians? Those who can transfer Hindostan to Carolina, in 1790, can, with equal facility, give history a retrograde movement, and tell us, what nobody will have the temerity to deny, that our ancestors generally laid this duty to protect and encourage the planters of Louisiana, though then not within the circle of our Confederacy.

The Tariff Bill.

Such is the foundation upon which this argument of reciprocity rests. An argument addressed to our local prejudices. He regretted to perceive that the debate, on every item of the bill, seemed to be generally confined too much to mere local ground. It was natural, it was proper, that we should advocate the interest of our State, and of the particular district we represent; but he trusted the time would come, when we should bring into every discussion a more national feeling—when our national interests would be consulted.

Mr. BRENT rose in reply to the gentlemen from Kentucky and Pennsylvania. He certainly did not suppose that any gentleman from Kentucky, knowing, as he must necessarily do, that cotton bagging cannot be supplied from that State to meet the demand from Louisiana and the other cotton-growing States, would oppose the present amendment. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky, said Mr. B., gave me a piece of information, with which, he said, I probably was already acquainted—that Kentucky had not only supplied bagging for the cotton of Louisiana, but, during the late war, had stood behind it to defend Louisiana from invasion. I acknowledge, said Mr. B., the truth of what the gentleman has stated. I trust I feel, with the people whom I represent, a due sense of gratitude, for the services rendered on that occasion; and, if the honorable gentleman intended to claim a pecuniary compensation for them, on behalf of the citizens of Kentucky, and will make out a statement of the account, Louisiana stands ready promptly to pay it. But it was not true that Kentucky did furnish, during the war an adequate supply of cotton bagging even for Louisiana alone. The State of Louisiana consumes nearly one million of square yards annually, but she received, during the war, only about six hundred thousand yards of it from Kentucky. He would appeal to the candor of the honorable gentleman, to say, whether, on all occasions, when the Western country was in need of aid, Louisiana had ever been wanting in efforts to advance its interests. On a late occasion, with which gentlemen were familiar, Louisiana had united in measures which she believed to be for the interest of the Western States, although very doubtful whether her own interest might not be rather impaired than promoted by them. All I ask of gentlemen, said Mr. B., is, that they will do what is just. I am not opposed to laying a duty on this article so soon as Kentucky will let us see that she can make it in quantity sufficient for the demand; but the nation is not to be forced, blinded, into a measure, which was calculated to amount to a prohibition of the imported article. As to what the gentlemen have said about a protecting duty on cotton, they may repeal it as soon as they like. What! when we grow more than twice as much cotton as is wanted for home consumption, and export it largely every year, do gentlemen talk to us about a protecting duty on cotton, to be counter-acted by the prohibition of imported bagging? It shows the same unfairness, the same want of candor, that they have throughout exhibited on this question. [Mr. B. was called to order by the Chairman, for this expression.] It was within the knowledge of gentlemen, that this duty never was intended for protection—it was laid when no cotton was raised in the United States, and it was laid for revenue solely. The same thing might be said of the duty on sugar. The cotton of Louisiana is now protected by a duty of three cents per pound—two cents and a half of this was imposed while Louisiana was under the French and Spanish Governments; and the paltry half cent which has since been added, was added, not for protection, but revenue. But, sir, said he, it is in vain to urge us on such arguments; Louisiana will not vote on any arrangement or compromise—she goes on principle; and unless gentlemen are determined to outrage all justice, the amendment ought to be adopted. The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, tells us, that Kentucky can supply the whole demand for cotton bagging. That may, in the course of time, prove to be true; but, until they do supply the demand, the duty should not be imposed.

Mr. HENRY, of Kentucky, rose, in reply to Mr. BRENT. He said he had not intended to take a part in this discussion; but he felt himself called upon to step forward, by the frequent repetition of a name which must always be dear to his heart. The State of Kentucky, as the land of his nativity, had the strongest claim upon his affection. However disparagingly she might be estimated by others, "he knew that he loved her, whatever she was." He must be permitted to say, that the gentleman from Louisiana had indulged himself in a course of remarks which seemed to be characterized by an invidious spirit—an improper imputation on motives.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

[Here Mr. BRENT rose to explain. The gentleman was mistaken, if he understood him as imputing impure or improper motives to the advocates of the bill. He had no such intention. He meant no personal reflection on any gentleman on this floor, and he wished to be so understood.]

Mr. HENRY resumed. He believed the gentleman, from his soul. His zeal for what he supposes to be the interest of his constituents, as proposed to be affected, as he conceives, by the bill, had probably hurried him into expressions of an unguarded kind, susceptible of a construction he did not wish them to bear. I, on the other hand, said Mr. H., am free to confess, that I am in favor of this provision of the bill, because I believe its operation will be highly beneficial to that section of the country which I have the honor to represent. I am not ashamed to acknowledge, that this consideration exerts a powerful effect on me. Might I not impute to the gentleman a motive equally selfish, as the ground of his opposition? And if I did, and should substantiate the charge, what would I gain? Nothing. The motives which actuate gentlemen are perfectly immaterial to the question; each member must stand or fall by the discharge of his duty; to his own conscience, and to his constituents. The foundation of all social love, is self love. Why does a man love his country? Because it is his own country. The attachment is selfish in its origin, but it becomes elevated and refined as it extends. This much abused principle of human action has been finely portrayed by a poet and philosopher of the last century:

"Self-love just serves the virtuous mind to shake,
As the small pebble stirs the peaceful lake;
The centre mov'd, a circle straight succeeds,
Another still, and still another spreads;
Wide, and more wide, th' o'erflowing of the mind,
Takes ev'ry creature in, of every kind.
Friend, parent, neighbor, first it will embrace;
Our country next, and last, all human race."

It is so with all the attachments of life. When we come to analyze and trace them, we find their ultimate source to be self love.

The argument of the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. H. said, so far from convincing him that the duty ought to be stricken out, had much strengthened his conviction that it ought to remain in the bill. What are the positions which he takes? He says that Kentucky, Ohio, and Tennessee, are, together, insufficient to supply the demand for cotton bagging which exists in Louisiana, Georgia, and the other cotton-growing States. But why, sir? Have we not the soil, the industry, the economy, or the foresight of our interest, which would fit us to produce the article? Yes, sir. Our soil is as fertile as any under Heaven! Forty years perpetual use has not, in the least, exhausted its fertility. And as to industry, I may with truth say, for the people of that region, that there are none more willing to earn their bread, as under the common curse of our race they must earn it, by the sweat of their brow, than the farmers of the West. Nor are they remarkable for any want of calculation, or of quickness of perception, to discover what will advance their interest. What, then, is wanting, sir? Precisely what the bill proposes to give us—protection, encouragement. Again, the gentleman has stated that our factories are languishing. Admit the fact, sir, and again I ask why? The same answer must be given: for want of protection—for want of encouragement.

The gentleman tells you that the article we have hitherto made has been inferior in quality. Still, I ask him why, and still the same answer recurs—for want of protection, for want of encouragement. Give us protection, sir, and at once you give us encouragement. As soon as encouragement is secured to us, an instantaneous investment of capital will follow; as soon as capital is invested, competition will take place; and competition will produce an immediate improvement of the fabric, &c. By way of proving that all Ohio, and Kentucky, and Tennessee cannot produce enough cotton bagging for the use of the South, the honorable gentleman informed us that the State of Louisiana used nearly one million of yards of the article. I can, in return, inform that honorable gentleman (and I say it from the personal knowledge of a distinguished member of this House) that, in the town of Lexington alone, more than one million of yards of cloth are made in only ten factories—the raw material of the whole of which is drawn from a single county. Sir, I will venture to pledge myself, and to predict, that, under adequate encouragement, the State of Kentucky alone will be perfectly competent to supply the whole Southern market with this article. Sir, take away this duty, and what equivalent is left to the West, for all the burdens which are to be imposed on her by the other provisions of this bill? While all other parts of the Union are looked to and cared for, shall we alone stand without a shelter? Must we be sunk lower, and still lower, in the scale of this nation? Impoverished, as the West has been, by a pernicious system of policy, must she suffer still more? What, sir, has she done to forfeit your protection? Has she been wanting in loyalty? Has she been wanting in zeal for your cause? Has she failed you in the hour of danger? No, sir; she is linked to this Government by ties of the strongest attachment; in this feeling we shall live, in this feeling we shall die; but I trust in God that we shall not, on this account, be denied our share of the national protection.

The honorable member from Louisiana has alluded, in his remarks, more particularly to the factories of Kentucky. Sir, Louisiana and Kentucky are bound to each other by ties as strong as those which hold in connexion the sun and the earth—they are naturally inseparable. The citizens of Louisiana are planters; we are farmers and graziers. They give their whole time and attention to the raising of cotton; we are precluded from doing this; we have neither the soil nor the climate adapted to the production of that valuable plant; we raise their pork, beef, and flour; and nothing can affect the plenty or scarcity of these articles in Kentucky, that does not affect

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. of R.

Louisiana in almost the same degree. No sooner are our crops injured, than the planters of Louisiana feel it. Who raises their hogs, their horses? The people of the West. On the other hand, we go to them for all our market—and such is the competition, from the extended region in which our products are raised, that the price of our commodities sinks in that market till our shipping merchants are almost all ruined, and even the farmers themselves obtain barely the amount of their actual expenses. This trade, sir, is highly beneficial to Louisiana, but it is a losing trade to Kentucky and the West. Sir, we are fast becoming, we have already become, tributary to Louisiana. We are hewers of wood and drawers of water for the wealthy planters of the South. Sir, we do not complain of this. We cannot help it. It is the inevitable course of things. But will they refuse us, in turn, some small equivalent? While they are amassing fortunes, will they not allow some small field for our infant manufactures? Sir, even the slave, himself, who toils without hope and without remuneration, must have some little encouragement to alleviate his bondage. The market is all against us; we toil and reap no reward, and unless some alteration takes place we cannot toil much longer. I trust, sir, our high-minded friends in the South will not feel disposed to deny us the avails of such a duty as that now proposed.

There is one other consideration on which I would touch, but with the greatest delicacy. It is the policy of the bill. What is the end proposed by the whole measure? To protect the industry of American citizens. The foundation of the policy is a determination no longer to feed the workmen of other countries, but to employ our own people. Sir, the true wealth of any country is the profits of its labor. Even the capital employed in commerce does not so truly and permanently enrich the country as the capital employed in agriculture. He who feeds two men and two women, where before but one man and one woman could be fed, deserves well of his country. Pursue, then, a policy which will feed your people—which will strengthen your mass of population. They will repay you with support and attachment. They will shed their blood in your defence.

Strike out the duty, and who will be benefited? The Autocrat of Russia. He is the greatest hemp grower. Does the gentleman from Louisiana wish to feed the Russian boors, rather than the hemp growers of the American soil? And, if he does, is it sound policy? Ought we, instead of increasing our own strength and resources, to strengthen an arm already too strong? Why should we suffer a foreign Power to draw from us that wealth which may hereafter be turned into bayonets and aimed at the vitals of our country? Do gentlemen wish to see a Russian fleet hovering on our coast? and will they drain our own country to help to build it? The people of the West, of all others, have the least reason to dread the approach of an enemy. The war must rage on our seaboard, before it can reach them. But what has been their conduct? Did they wait at home till the foe reached the Kentucky line? Did they say, let the enemy come here, and we will resist him? No, sir. They left their homes and their boundary lines behind them; they went forth to meet the foe. They will do it again; but they do not seek to invite his approach by prostrating our domestic strength, and giving our resources to strangers.

Mr. Top said, that he was sorry to find that the debate threatened to become serious from the time it was likely to occupy. He certainly should not increase the evil. He rose merely to assure the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) that, in one point of his argument, he had entirely succeeded with him, and that was, in proving that our grandmothers had not grown up in a tobacco yard. In another point, he could not say the honorable gentleman had been quite so fortunate—he meant, in proving that Alexander Hamilton was no statesman, because he could not tell us, thirty years ago, how much cotton would be raised in the United States in 1823. Sir, I never thought that Alexander Hamilton was a conjuror; but, to argue from this, that he was no statesman, is not, to me, very conclusive. The gentleman had not succeeded near so well in this point, Mr. T. said, as he did about our grandmothers. There was another point. The gentleman had said that the duty on cotton was laid for revenue, and it was laid in 1789; but, he could inform the gentleman that when the duty on cotton was raised to three cents per pound, it was done on the representation that cotton was expected to be raised here, and it had reference to that expectation. As to the duty on sugar, if the Committee were not already competent to see that the three cents a pound duty on sugar was a clear bounty upon the culture of that article nothing that he could say would make them see it.

Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, said, that when this bill was introduced into the House by the honorable Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, he had hoped to see it discussed on general grounds, without a reference to the local interest of each particular State. But, instead of this, he was sorry to perceive that every member who entered into the discussion, referred to its operation on his own individual district alone. State was set in opposition to State. Kentucky and Louisiana were arrayed against each other, and it was maintained that Louisiana, by consenting to the duty on bagging, was to repay Kentucky for her defence during the war. If this doctrine should prevail, other parts of the country would be affected by the duty, which had had no share in the service. He represented a small district of the cotton-growing country, and that district would have to help Louisiana in paying her tribute to Kentucky. He would ask whether Georgia, too, and South Carolina, and the whole cotton country of the Union, were to be called on to aid in repaying Kentucky? And how was this repayment to be made? By encouraging manufacturing establishments which are now in existence and operation? Not at all. Gentlemen from the West say, pay us in advance, and then we will furnish you the article. They do not say that they have it now. But the duty is at once to be laid—then time must elapse before their factories go into operation; and after all, it is a mere experiment. But, we are told, some interests must be sacrificed, and that there is a great and predominating interest, which must and will prevail, and the rest must be more or less sacrificed to aid it. But, sir, is such the situation of the people of these United States? Must we sacrifice the interests of one State, in order to aid another? I believe not—I trust not.

But, as I am opposed to the whole bill, I shall not detain the Committee by going into an argument on its details. I grant, indeed, sir, that it is a sound principle of Republican government, that the majority shall prevail, but is it good policy, when the minority is large and respectable, to refuse to listen to their objections? Will you force on them that which the majority says is for their benefit, but which they themselves say is to their injury? He was confident that, if the votes of all who are interested in the tax now proposed could be individually taken, a large majority would be found to be opposed to the measure.

Mr. MARVIN, of New York, then rose and said that, if there was a single feature in the whole bill which ought to be retained, he thought it was this. If there was any article which the United States can raise in abundance, it is hemp; if there was any article which we can manufacture, it was cotton bagging. It is said that the effect of the duty will be, to raise the price of the articles. Such might be the effect; but if it were, it would be only temporary. It is stated, said Mr. M., that the manufactures are languishing; but this is not because they could not, in a settled course of business, afford to make the article as cheap as it comes from Europe, but because the market is precarious, and they are liable to be overwhelmed with temporary importations. But, granting that, for some time, the price will be a little higher, are we called upon to make no sacrifices to support our own manufactures? We do not, however, ask this. We do not call on the South to make any sacrifice whatever. Grant, for the sake of argument, that the State of South Carolina alone, pays for the article of bagging $60,000 a year. Who pays this? The consumer pays it. Though that one State pays it in the first instance, it is paid back again by all other States, in the various proportions in which they are consumers of cotton. The honorable Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures has shown that one-third of all the cotton raised in the United States, is consumed within the United States. But where? Certainly not in the cotton-growing States. Then it must be by the other States, and, as far as they are consumers, they pay the duty.

Sir, what is that we propose? To make this country independent of foreign manufactures. For this end, we ask it for a season to pay a higher price for a particular article, until that article obtains a certain and a settled market; and we ask this higher price to be paid, not by one particular district, but by the whole country which consumes the article. Sir, the bagging follows the cotton, go where it will, and is paid for with it. I do not forget that two-thirds of what is raised goes abroad; but surely the country cannot greatly suffer by the consumption of this portion of its manufactures abroad. All we ask is, to guard, for a time, the infant manufacture against such fluctuations in the market as will destroy it, and then you will get the article cheaper than ever. Was it not so with coarse cottons? But, if not, we are prepared, I hope, one and all, from the East to the West, in the North and in the South, to submit to the increase of price, so far as we are the consumers.

A motion was now made that the Committee rise, which was carried—yeas 100, nays 96.

So the Committee rose, reported progress, and had leave to sit again.

MONDAY, February 16.

Mr. LIVINGSTON presented a petition of sundry aliens residing in the State of Louisiana, praying that the laws upon the subject of naturalization may be amended, to the end that greater facilities may be afforded to foreigners intending to become citizens of the United States; which petition was referred to a select committee, and Mr. LIVINGSTON, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. DWIGHT, Mr. GURLEY, Mr. DUFFEE, and Mr. BRECK, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire and report whether any, and what sum, is due from the United States to Marigny Dauterive, of the city of New Orleans, for supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, and for the services of his negro.

Mr. TOMLINSON laid the following resolution on the table, for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether any measures have been taken to carry into effect the resolution of Congress, passed June 17th, 1777, directing a monument to be erected to the memory of David Wooster, a Brigadier General in the Army of the United States, who fell in "defending the liberties of America and bravely repelling an inroad of the British forces to Danbury, in Connecticut;" and whether the sum of five hundred dollars, appropriated for the purpose of carrying that resolution into execution, has ever been paid to "the Executive power of the State of Connecticut."

Mr. STORRS laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Department of the Treasury be directed to transmit to this House the statements of the affairs of the Bank of the United States, on the 30th day of December of the years 1822 and 1823.

Mr. WRIGHT laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, (if such information may be given without injury to the public,) whether the title of the United Brethren for propagating the Gospel among the Heathen, to certain sections of land in Ohio, authorized to be purchased by the act making further appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1823, and for other purposes, passed the 3d March, 1823, has been purchased for the United States; and if so, to cause to be laid before this House, a copy of the contract of purchase, and of such other papers in his possession, (proper to be communicated,) relating to the survey and disposition of said lands.

Mr. WHITTLESEY laid the following resolution on the table for consideration to-morrow:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to present to this House a statement of the amount of money expended in conformity with the provisions of an act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," approved the 29th of April, 1816, and of the act to amend said act, approved the 3d of March, 1821: also, the number of vessels built or now on the stocks, with their rates, the value of the timber purchased, or for which contracts have been made, and whether sufficient timber has been purchased or contracted to build the vessels contemplated by the provisions of said act.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of rendering the designation of jurors to serve in the courts of the United States, in each State, conformable at all times to the mode of designating jurors which may be adopted in the State courts of such State.

On motion of Mr. HEMPHILL, the Committee of Ways and Means were directed to inquire into the expediency of allowing the benefit of drawback on all goods, wares, and merchandise, imported into either of the ports of New York, Philadelphia, or Baltimore, and transported from any one of the said ports to either of the others, partly by land conveyance and partly by water, in the like manner as if the same were transported coastwise.

On motion of Mr. HOUSTON, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing Dempsey Powell pay for two guns, impressed during the late war between the United States and Great Britain.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the act of Congress, entitled "An act further to establish the compensation of officers of the customs, and to alter certain collection districts, and for other purposes, so far as the same relates to the compensation of the collectors of the several districts on the northern frontier of the United States.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief Walter S. Chandler and Samuel Ward;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

CLAIM OF BEAUMARCHAIS.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, made a detailed report upon the claim of the heirs and representatives of the late Caron de Beaumarchais, of France; which report was ordered to lie on the table. The report is as follows:

The claim of Mr. Beaumarchais' representatives against this Government is the only unsettled item of a large account for military supplies furnished by him to this country during the first years of the war of Independence. It amounts to one million of livres, exclusive of interest, and arises from a charge made by the accounting officers of the Treasury, against Mr. Beaumarchais, of that sum, received by him from the French Government, on the 10th of June, 1776, for the use of the United States, but for which the claimants, not denying that he so received it, insist that he has already accounted to his own Government, to whom alone he was accountable. Against this charge, which they allege to be equally unwarranted by the justice of the case and the established rules of evidence, they have been seeking relief from Congress, from the year 1805, (when the final settlement took place,) to the present day.

In the absence of more positive and satisfactory evidence on the matter in controversy, it has been found necessary, by all those who have successively investigated the subject, to refer to numerous official letters and documents, many of which have little direct bearing on the question, but, taken in connexion with others, shed some light on a subject that is however yet involved in obscurity, and will, probably, ever so remain.

A brief abstract of the history and progress of this claim, as furnished by these documents, annexed to this report in the order of their dates, may conduce to a better understanding of the subject, and show the grounds and principles on which the committee has come to its conclusion.

Early in the year 1776, Mr. Beaumarchais called on Mr. Arthur Lee, then a secret agent of the United States in London, and requested him to communicate to Congress that the Court of France was disposed to assist the Americans, with money and arms, to the amount of 200,000 louis d'or, which should be sent through any of the islands in the West Indies that should be agreed upon. At the next interview, he requested that a small quantity of tobacco, or other commodity, should be remitted, to give the intended aid the air of a mercantile transaction. Cape Francois was settled between them as the channel of conveyance, and it was agreed that Mr. Beaumarchais should carry on his correspondence with American agents, under the fictitious signature of Roderique Hortales & Co.

Soon after this, Mr. Silas Deane arrived in Paris, as a Commissioner from the secret committee of Congress, for the purchase of clothing and military stores, and in July, 1776, he and Mr. Beaumarchais, under the name of Hortales & Co., arranged the terms under which the supplies were to be furnished. Mr. Beaumarchais, it may be observed, was not a merchant, but, being distinguished for his wit and literary talents, was in great favor at the Court of Louis XVI.

In the latter end of 1776, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Deane, and Mr. Arthur Lee, were appointed joint Commissioners from the United States to the Court of France, and in the course of this and the following year eight cargoes were shipped by Mr. Beaumarchais to the United States, either directly or through the West Indies, which, exclusive of freight, insurance, and other charges, amounted to upwards of three millions of livres. During the same and the three following years remittances were made to Mr. Beaumarchais, in tobacco and other home productions, but to a small amount in proportion to the value of his supplies.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

In 1777 two millions, in four instalments of half a million each, were advanced by the Royal Treasury, on the receipt of the American Commissioners, to Mr. Grand, their banker in Paris; and in June of the same year a million was received, in the same mode, of the Farmers General.

During this time there seemed to have been some uncertainty about the character of these supplies, on the part of the American Commissioners, who supposed them partly furnished by the King of France, either as a loan or gratuity, and partly by Mr. Beaumarchais.

This opinion, which originated in the first communication to Mr. Lee from Mr. Beaumarchais, was strengthened by the repeated assurances made to them by the French Minister that no return was expected for these supplies, and because most of the military stores were taken from the King's arsenals. Nor were the remittances which were claimed by Mr. Beaumarchais, and occasionally made, at all inconsistent with the supposition; as it had been part of the original plan to give the assistance afforded by France to the United States the character of a commercial transaction, for the purpose of concealing it from the British Government. On this subject there was an evident diversity of opinion among the Commissioners.

Mr. Lee always seemed to think that the supplies were furnished by the Court of France. Mr. Deane considered that they were furnished by Mr. Beaumarchais, on his own account. And, in February, 1778, Dr. Franklin and Mr. Lee, in a letter to the secret committee of Congress, recommend Congress to leave Mr. Beaumarchais' demand to be settled by them in Paris, as there was in it a "mixture of public and private concern," which Congress could not so well develop.

In September, 1778, the American Commissioners, Dr. Franklin, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Adams, wrote to the French Minister, Count De Vergennes, to ask his advice relative to ratifying a contract with Hortales & Co. for further supplies, and to make inquiry of him concerning the supplies already furnished. They say, that both they and the people of America, have generally understood they were under obligations to His Majesty for the greater part of the supplies, and that they cannot "discover that any written contract was ever made between Congress, or any agent of theirs, and the house of Roderique Hortales & Co., nor do they know of any living witness, or any other evidence, whose testimony can ascertain as to who the persons are who constitute the house of Roderique Hortales & Co., or what were the terms upon which the merchandise and munitions of war were supplied, neither as to the price, nor the time or conditions of payment." They profess their readiness to settle the accounts, and their willingness to discharge the obligation, as soon as Providence shall put it in their power.

To this letter, Monsieur De Vergennes replied, that the King had furnished nothing; that he simply permitted Mr. Beaumarchais to provide himself from the Royal Arsenals, on condition of his replacing the articles, and that he would interpose to prevent the United States from being pressed for reimbursement of the articles of a military nature.

From this time, Mr. Beaumarchais was recognised as the creditor of the United States for the whole amount of these supplies, and payments were made to him, partly in tobacco, but principally in bills of exchange, drawn in his favor on our Minister in France, which, including the remittances previously made him, amounted in all, to upwards of three and a half millions of livres.

In April, 1781, Mr. Beaumarchais had a general settlement of his accounts with Mr. Silas Deane, in Paris; but this settlement not being ratified by Congress, and Mr. Deane's authority to make it being denied, Mr. Barclay, who was sent to France as Consul General, was invested with power to settle the accounts of Mr. Beaumarchais. He, for some time, refused to make a new settlement, insisting on the one previously made with Mr. Deane, but he finally consented, and one was made in 1785, subject, however, as it appears, to the ratification of Congress.

The length of time required to examine the numerous details of Mr. Beaumarchais' accounts, and the difficulty of agreeing on various charges for commission, freight, and insurance, concerning which, there was neither a previous contract nor an unvarying standard, may fairly account for the delays experienced by Mr. Beaumarchais, in the final adjustment of his accounts, both by Congress and its agents, till 1787, when, by the development of a new fact, a difficulty occurred which has outlived every other, and which has laid the foundation of the present claim.

In February, 1783, Dr. Franklin entered into a contract or treaty with the Count De Vergennes, relative to the loans and subsidies made by France to the United States, by which he acknowledged on the part of the United States three millions before the treaty of February, 1778, and six millions in 1781, as the gratuitous gift of the King.

In July, 1786, on a settlement with Mr. Grand, our banker at Paris, it was discovered that he had given the United States credit but for two millions received before 1778, instead of three, as was stated in the treaty of February, 1783. Dr. Franklin, conceiving his character might be implicated by this important variance, wrote to Mr. Grand for an explanation, and suggests that the million furnished ostensibly by the Farmers General, might have been a gift of the Crown. Mr. Grand in September following, answers, that he had applied to Mr. Durival, the principal of one of the departments of finance, for a solution of the difficulty, who had stated that there had been an advance from the Royal Treasury of one million, on the 10th of June, 1776, in addition to the two millions advanced in 1777, and which Mr. Grand had received. It further appears, that this answer of Mr. Durival not being satisfactory, Mr. Grand applied to him for a copy of the receipt of the million advanced in June, 1776, to which Mr. Durival replied, that he had laid Mr. Grand's letters before the Count de Vergennes, who constantly replied that the copy of the receipt he required, had no relation to the million received from the Farmers General, nor to the business with which he had been intrusted by Congress, and it would be useless to give it to him. On which, Mr. Grand observes, that he could not conceive the reason for this reserve.

In January, 1787, Dr. Franklin, on receiving these letters from Mr. Grand, communicated them to Mr. Charles Thomson, Secretary to Congress, and adds, that he conjectures the person who received the mil-tion in June, 1776, must be Mr. Beaumarchais, and that it was a cabinet secret, ("mistère du cabinet," which, perhaps, should not be further inquired into, unless necessary to guard against more demands than may be just from that agent. For, it may well be supposed that if the Court furnished him with the means of supplying us, they may not be willing to furnish authentic proofs of such a transaction so early in our dispute with Britain." He inquires if Mr. Beaumarchais continued to press his demands, and adds, "It is true the million in question makes no difference in your accounts with the King of France, it not being mentioned or charged as so much lent and to be repaid, but stated as freely given. Yet if it was put into the hands of any of your agents or ministers, they ought certainly to account for it."

In the course of the same year, Mr. Beaumarchais addressed Congress on the subject of his account; and, whether it was because its style gave offence, as he states in his own memorial of 1795, or the belief which now prevailed, that he had received the million that had lately come to light, no notice seems to have been taken of his application, until 1789, when his accounts were referred to the Board of Treasury, a committee of the old Congress, consisting of Mr. Arthur Lee, Mr. Livingston, and Mr. Osgood, who report, among other things, that the balance claimed by Mr. Beaumarchais, on his account, certified by Mr. Deane in 1781, then amounted to about $900,000, and that the debits against the United States had no other voucher to support them, but the certificate of Mr. Deane. They make various deductions, for charges of commission, insurance, and two of the cargoes said not to have reached the United States, and find a balance due the United States, of, livres, 742,413 9.5, "exclusive of the one million of livres, which (if received by Mr. Beaumarchais from the Court of France) must be added thereto;" and they submit two resolutions—1st. That the settlement with Mr. Deane, in April, 1781, was not binding on the United States; and, 2d. That Mr. Beaumarchais settle his accounts at the Treasury of the United States, and be required to transmit the necessary vouchers in support of the same.

After the new Constitution went into operation, Mr. J. A. Chevalié, as the agent of Mr. Beaumarchais, applied to the Treasury Department for a settlement of the accounts of his principal; and, in May, 1793, the Auditor certified that the same had been examined and adjusted by him. He adverts to the decision of the Board of Treasury, in 1788, and makes a different, and, as the committee think, a correct decision on the contested questions, of insurance, commission, charges of merchandise, and the two cargoes erroneously supposed not to have reached the United States; and he finds the balance due to Mr. Beaumarchais to be, livres, 2,280,231 17.8. But he subjoins a note, that the million which had been advanced by the French Government, on the 10th June, 1776, to somebody, had been, probably, received by Mr. Beaumarchais, and he therefore recommends that the payment of the balance found due from the United States should be suspended until "some further measures could be taken," to clear up the mystery. This report seemed to have received the sanction of the Comptroller and Secretary of the Treasury.

In June, 1794, Mr. Gouverneur Morris, then our Minister to the French Republic, addressed a note to Mr. Buchot, the Commissary of Exterior Relations, for information relative to the million advanced in June, 1776, to whom it was paid, and for what objects expended, with the avowed purpose of opposing this sum against the claims of Mr. Beaumarchais, in case he should have been the person who received it. In reply to which, Mr. Buchot sends a copy of a receipt, dated the 10th of June, 1776, and given by Mr. Beaumarchais, for one million of livres, paid by the order of the Count de Vergennes, and to be accounted for to him; which receipt, Mr. Buchot remarks, "appears to be the one necessary to the United States, in adjusting their accounts."

After the disclosure of this receipt, no doubt seemed to be entertained that Mr. Beaumarchais was the person who had received the million of livres, advanced for the use of the United States, in June, 1775, and he was held accountable for that amount by the accounting officers of the Treasury, though the charge was earnestly resisted by Mr. Beaumarchais, in a long and eloquent memorial, addressed to the President, in 1795, as, also, by his agent, before and after his death, in 1799, and was, in 1802, the subject of a remonstrance from Mr. Pichon, the chargé de affaires from France to the United States.

In 1805, the accounts of Mr. Beaumarchais were definitively settled by the Comptroller, and after charging him with the million received on the 10th June, 1776, with interest from that date, a balance of 222,046 12.2, equal to $41,119 74, was found due him on the 1st January, 1791.

In 1806, Madame Eugénie Beaumarchais de la Rue, the only daughter and heiress of Mr. Beaumarchais, by a memorial presented through her agent, made an appeal to Congress from the decision of the Treasury Department, which has been renewed, from time to time, to the present period.

The several reports which have been made by the committees to whom this claim has been referred, as they contain nearly all the arguments that can be urged, either for or against its merits, are annexed to this report, and they may be here briefly noticed.

In 1806, the Committee of Claims made an unfavorable report, except as to the balance of $41,119 74, which, with interest from the 1st January, 1791, was paid to the claimants.

A note from General Turreau, the French Minister, accompanied the petition of the claimant, in which it was stated for the first time, that, in consequence of a minute search in the records of the Department of Foreign Relations, there had been found in a file, entitled "United States," a receipt of Mr. Beaumarchais of the 10th of June, 1776, for a million, which was "given to him by orders from the King, for an object of secret political service of which he reserved the knowledge to himself," as well as the account rendered in the same year, by Mr. De Vergennes to the King, of the application of that sum, in conformity with his instructions. This communication was accompanied by observations and arguments on the part of the Minister, in favor of the claim.

In the following year, the President, by a Message dated February 6, 1807, again brought the subject to the notice of Congress, and at the same time communicated a note from the French Minister, together with his answers to the objections which had been made to the claim, in a letter from Mr. Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the committee of the preceding year. The note from the minister thus concludes: "The present Government of France has made all possible research, in order to enlighten its equity and its justice, in an affair which interests a family, whose head employed all the fortune which he ought to have left it, to the support of the American cause; and it is, after the most intimate conviction, that this sum is due to Mr. De Beaumarchais, that it has charged its Minister Plenipotentiary to declare now, that the million given on the 10th June, 1776, to Mr. De Beaumarchais, was employed in a secret service; that an account of it has been rendered to the King, and approved by him, and that it was not given on account of supplies furnished by the said Beaumarchais to the United States." The Committee of Claims to whom the subject was referred, on the faith of this declaration, made a favorable report; but as questions of law might arise in investigating the case, they recommended that the claim be submitted to the Secretary of State, with instructions to report to Congress at the ensuing session.

H. of R.

Claim of Beaumarchais.

This course was adopted, and in December 1807, the Secretary of State reported the opinion of Mr. Rodney, the Attorney General, on the question, whether the controverted million ought to be regarded as a legal payment by the United States, which opinion, after a full examination of the subject, was thus summed up, "that the plea of payment or discount could not be supported, unless collusion with Beaumarchais be attributed to the French Government; an idea inadmissible, and which could not enter into his view of the case."

In March, 1812, the subject was again referred to the Committee of Claims, who made an unfavorable report, in the words of the report of a former Committee of Claims in 1806, with the addition of a letter from Mr. Pinkney, then Attorney General, to the chairman of the committee, in which he says, that "viewing the question as a mere matter of law, he was compelled to say, that the title to the deduction insisted upon must be shown by the United States, and that the evidence would not be sufficient to establish it in a court of justice."

In January, 1817, the subject was "recommended to the favorable attention" of Congress, by a Message from the President, who at the same time transmitted a letter from Mr. De Neuville, Minister from France, to the United States, in support of the claim, and the correspondence which had taken place during the preceding year, between Mr. Gallatin our Minister in France, and the Duke de Richelieu, Minister of Foreign Affairs, relative to the subject. The claim was referred to a committee who did not act on it. And in the following year, the present President of the United States, by a special Message in January, 1818, gave the claim a similar recommendation. It was accordingly referred to a select committee, who, after a very elaborate report on the facts and merits of the case, decided in favor of the claim; but their decision was negated by the House.

In March, 1814, a select committee made an unfavorable report on the claim.

In March, 1822, another Message was received from the President, transmitting three letters from Mr. De Neuville on the subject of the claim, and recommending it to the favor of Congress as before, but the subject was not acted on.

At the succeeding session, this Message was referred to a select committee, who on the 28th January, 1823, reported a bill in favor of the claimant, which for the want of time, passed only to a second reading.

It thus appears, that one Committee of Claims, two select committees, and two Attorney Generals, have decided in favor of the claim, either on the ground of its justice, or of the illegality of the discount claimed by the United States, and that two Committees of Claims and one select committee have decided against it.

After the most attentive examination of the numerous documents in which the above mentioned facts are disclosed, the committee are of opinion, that, though the disposition of the million of livres received by Mr. Beaumarchais, in June, 1776, is involved in some uncertainty, which may never be entirely dispelled, yet they think there is strong persuasive evidence, that it was meant by the King of France to assist Mr. Beaumarchais in the purchase of those supplies with which he furnished the United States. In support of their opinion, they rely on the following facts: The first offer of the French Government to render secret assistance to the United States, was made through Mr. Beaumarchais. The amount of supplies which he afterwards furnished, was far beyond his apparent resources; and his former habits and pursuits though they comported very well with the character of a secret political agent, rendered him but ill qualified for commercial transactions. Most, if not all the articles of a military nature, were taken from the King's arsenals. The opinion, that the supplies were furnished principally, if not altogether by the King, was entertained for two years by the American Commissioners, who were on the spot. The repeated declarations of the Minister himself, to the same effect, as evinced not only by repeated letters from Mr. Arthur Lee, but by the joint letters of the three Commissioners to the Secret Committee of Congress, dated 7th October, 1777. The presumptions arising from these facts, receive the strongest confirmation, from the letter written by the Count De Vergennes to Louis XVI., dated May 2d, 1776, which is taken from the history of the French diplomacy, and believed to be authentic, in which he speaks of being authorized by the King, "to furnish a million of livres for the use of the English colonies," and of the transmission of the funds which his Majesty was pleased to grant the Americans, and of directing the necessary precautions to be taken, as if the proposed agent, Monsieur Montaudon, advanced the funds on his own account. He mentions also, the reply he had made to Mr. Beaumarchais, which was evidently favorable and connected with the same subject; and states, the precautionary steps he had taken to prevent discovery, as it was of consequence that the operation should not be known, or "imputed to the Government."

From this letter, it is clear that the million here spoken of, was intended to be paid to the United States, and not to others, for some secret service; that Mr. Beaumarchais had a principal agency in the transaction, and that in speaking of the importance of secrecy, the language applies rather to those aids which State policy might wish to conceal from Great Britain, than to that species of political services which might involve the character of individuals, and the honor of the nation.

The same work affords another piece of corroborating testimony. In a letter from Louis XVI. to the King of Spain, dated January 8th, 1778, he speaks of "succors of money and other kinds," which France had given the United States, the whole ostensibly on the score of trade.

To this mass of testimony which has been gradually elicited in the successive investigations on the subject, it is objected :

First Objection. That, whatever motives the French Government might have had before 1778, for concealing the advance of this million, it could have had none, after it had openly espoused the American cause, except those that are incident to all disbursements of secret service money.

To this it may be remarked, that, though the motives for concealment were much weakened after their open rupture with Great Britain, yet they might be supposed not to have entirely ceased after that event, for, as Dr. Franklin remarks, France might not be willing to furnish authentic proofs of such a transaction, so early, in our dispute with Great Britain; and that sagacious observer considered this reason sufficient to account for the mystery in which the "lost million" was involved. Besides, other facts have been concealed, long after any necessity for concealment could be supposed to exist. It was not until 1794 that the seemingly unimportant fact, that Mr. Beaumarchais was the person who received the money was communicated, nor until 1806 that it was declared to be for a secret political service.

Second Objection. That, as the knowledge of this million grew out of the contract of February, 1783, long after Mr. Beaumarchais had been the creditor of the United States, he ought not to be affected by an instrument to which he was no party, and of which he had no notice.

The committee think, that so far as concerns this transaction, neither Mr. Beaumarchais nor the United States are bound by this contract. They, because they had no knowledge of the facts which have since been disclosed; and he, because he was no party. But, he is bound by his own receipt, taken together with that evidence, which shows the money to have been received for the use of the United States.

Third Objection. That he has accounted for the disbursement of the money to his own Government, to whom alone he was responsible.

The only direct evidence of the fact, that Mr. Beaumarchais had accounted to his Government for the disbursement of the million received in June, 1776, is to be found in the paper subscribed by the King's own hand, dated December 7, 1776, in which it is stated that the million of livres, applicable to secret political services, had been "applied to the purposes intended by the King." But granting that this expression did not mean to refer simply to the payment of the money to Mr. Beaumarchais, but to that disposition of it which he should make; still it is not presumed that any other evidence would be required of Mr. Beaumarchais, that the money had been applied to its intended purpose, than that he had actually purchased and transmitted the supplies, which evidence he could probably find no difficulty in furnishing at the date of the King's letter, as the three first cargoes, amounting to a million and a half, actually left France before the 5th of February, 1777; and one million of that sum may easily have been expended in their purchase, before the 6th of December preceding; and indeed, in Mr. Beaumarchais' own letter to Congress, of the 1st December, 1776, he states the amount of his advances to be about one million. Besides thus satisfying his own Government that he had fulfilled its wishes, does not do away his obligation to account with the United States for the money received to their use, for that would enable him, in part, to frustrate, instead of fulfilling, the generous purposes of his Government.

Fourth Objection. That, whatever may be the doubts about the fact, the evidence is not sufficient to establish a legal discount against Mr. Beaumarchais, in a case in which the burden of proof lies on the United States.

If this were the case, the claim ought long since to have been settled by the accounting officers of the Treasury, as they would not probably feel themselves bound to allow any evidence in favor of a discount, that would be rejected by a court of justice. But, granting that they would, yet it must be recollected that the settlement now complained of has received the sanction of three successive Administrations, and Congress is applied to, not in the ordinary case of allowing a claim for which the law has made no provision, but to make a different decision, on a mere point of evidence, from that which has been made by the department, whose particular province it is to settle, all accounts in which the Government is a party, and whose functions best qualify it for the correct discharge of that duty. And, although the magnitude of the claim, and the acknowledged services of Mr. Beaumarchais, may warrant Congress in revising the decision of their accounting officers, yet, assuredly, they cannot be under any obligation, in exercising this extraordinary interposition, to pay the claim, so long as they have strong doubts of its justice.

But it is further contended that the repeated declarations of the French Government ought to outweigh the presumption arising from this mass of circumstantial evidence.

If, indeed, the proper functionaries of that Government, who were privy to the transaction, had explicitly declared that this million had not been used by Mr. Beaumarchais in the purchase of the supplies which he furnished to the United States, the comity and respect which ought to prevail between civilized nations in their friendly intercourse, might have bound us to receive the declaration as conclusive. But such is not the fact: the Count de Vergennes, who alone could speak from personal knowledge, so far from making such a declaration, did not mention, either at the time of the treaty of February, 1783, or when applied to, by Mr. Durival, in 1786, that Mr. Beaumarchais was the person who received the money. He says nothing even about its being for a secret political service. For aught that appears, he was not aware that the inquiry was material in our settlement with Mr. Beaumarchais, or was made for any other purpose than to exculpate Mr. Grand and Dr. Franklin. And this silence on facts, which have been since communicated, and which no considerations of national prudence or State policy required him, even then, to conceal, affords some presumption that he expected Mr. Beaumarchais would account for it, which is not indeed very strong, but is quite as much so as any other that is favorable to the claim. When, afterwards, in 1794, the receipt of Mr. Beaumarchais was brought to light, Mr. Buchot, the organ of the French Government, who produced it, indirectly admits that Mr. Beaumarchais was accountable to the United States for its amount. If the subsequent declarations of General Turreau and the Duke de Richelieu, to the contrary, have been in more positive terms, it is manifest that they do not speak from any personal knowledge of the transaction, but draw inferences from facts, of which we, having the same means of judging as themselves, have a right to make a different estimate.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Upon a full and candid review of the whole case, whatever may be our private wishes on the subject, and however it may be regretted that a controversy should arise in settling the compensation for the most important services, rendered with the most friendly sentiments, at a very critical period of the Revolution, yet, if the case be regarded as a mere money transaction between a private individual and this Government, and be judged by the rules of secondary evidence, (the best being in the possession of the party or his Government,) the committee are compelled to say, that the accounting officers of the Treasury were justified in refusing payment of the million in question, and that the Legislature would not be warranted in reversing their decision.

But the connexion which this transaction has with the French Government, and the delicate relation in which it places the United States with that Government, are not to be overlooked in this controversy. They make, as the committee think, an essential alteration in its character, and create, on the United States, a new duty.

The amount of Mr. Beaumarchais' original claim is undisputed. It has been adjusted, by the officers of our own Government, to their own satisfaction, and the discount which we claim was not paid by ourselves, but, as we say, by the French Government, by part of a voluntary gift to the United States: But that Government says, that the million which we seek to use as a discount, was expended for our benefit, in a purpose which both policy and honor forbid them to disclose, and that Mr. Beaumarchais, who was their agent as well as ours, ought not to be accountable to us for its disbursement. Now, however we may be inclined to think them mistaken, it seems to the committee that the self-respect of this nation will not permit it to dispute, with a donor, the character and object of his gift. On this question the wishes of France should supply the place of proof; and, as we received the declarations of the Count de Vergennes, in 1778, with regard to the military stores furnished by Mr. Beaumarchais, as conclusive; as, in 1783, we acknowledged the receipt of the million in question, without requiring any other evidence of the fact than the declaration of the French Government, so now that it is disclosed that Mr. Beaumarchais was the person who received the money, we are equally bound to receive their declarations respecting it, and consider him as not chargeable with this million. For, if the French Government is right, then we owe the money without a question; and, if it is mistaken, then, in paying the money, we merely return a part of the gift we received, rather than insist on applying it to a purpose to which the donor objects. And we should feel less hesitation in taking this course, as we thereby avoid the risk (which inferior evidence always implies) of injustice to the family of one whose meritorious services to this nation, in the hour of its utmost need, our foreign agents all concurred in acknowledging.

But, inasmuch as the obligation of the United States to pay this money, arises, in the view taken of it by the committee, from the relation in which we stand to the French Government, and as that Government has introduced the claim of Mr. Beaumarchais' heirs into the negotiation which has been for some time carried on, and is yet pending, between the two nations, with regard to the illegal seizures and confiscations made of the property of our citizens during the Imperial Government, the committee think that the claim had better be left to the friendly adjustment of the two Governments; and the rather, as, in the course of the negotiation, on the scene of the transaction, further facts may be developed to dispel the obscurity in which it is involved, and remove the doubts of either nation. With this view, they beg leave to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the claim of the petitioner, Eugenie Amelie Beaumarchais De la Rue, be referred to the Executive of the United States, to be adjusted in the pending negotiations between the United States and France, on such terms as they may think just and equitable.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill to amend the several acts respecting duties on imports.

The question, pending from the last day of sitting, being on the motion of Mr. BRENT, to strike out the clause imposing a duty of six cents per square yard on cotton bagging imported—

Mr. HAMILTON, of South Carolina, said, that a disposition to offer a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, had induced him, on Friday, at a late hour, to move the Committee to rise; and he would now briefly redeem this constructive pledge. That gentleman had broadly asserted that the cotton bagging of the West has no protection, and to this declaration he desired the Committee to advert; for, he presumed, the gentleman had forgotten the existing duty of twenty per cent., in effect, on the article in question, and a duty of one hundred per cent. on the raw material of which it is composed. Mr. H. said, he would offer this short detail, in proof of what he had thus affirmed—a piece of cotton bagging, of between sixty and seventy yards, costs, in England or Scotland, at fourteen cents per yard, about eight dollars and forty cents, on which there was paid, here, a duty of one dollar and eighty-four cents; so that, without adding freight and insurance, for every eight or nine dollars' worth of bagging, used in the United States, there was a clear protection to Kentucky of one dollar and eighty-four cents. This was, however, not enough—for the duty proposed in the bill under consideration, was equivalent to seventy-one per cent. This would be its operation; for, on a piece of cotton bagging of sixty running, or seventy square yards, at six cents per square yard, $4 20 would be the amount of the duty, to which is to be added the bounty allowed in England, on exportation, of three cents per pound, under the operation of the third section of the bill, which will be $1 80, making an aggregate duty of $6 on a piece of bagging costing originally but $8 40.

The gentleman also affirms, said Mr. H., that the raw material is insufficiently protected. Any thing beyond the present rate of duty and charges would seem to be a prohibition; for, it has been unanswerably made out by a variety of statements, founded upon undeniable data, that, if you add to the duty of $30 on each ton of imported hemp the original cost of the article, with that of transportation from the province in which it is raised to St. Petersburg, with freight, insurance, commission, and difference of exchange, that the protection now was equivalent to a duty of one hundred per cent. And here he would notice a remark which fell from the honorable gentleman in regard to the Western hemp, which, he had assured us, was at least ten per cent. stronger than the Russian. The House were in possession of a document, on this subject, which might be as valuable as the experience of the gentleman. The Navy Commissioners had transmitted a letter, (he believed to the Senate, and, during the recess of the House since Friday, he had conversed with some of the Commissioners on the subject,) in which it is stated that this apparent excellence of the Western hemp was altogether fallacious; for although, when new, it was apparently as strong as the Russian hemp, yet, in durability, it was not at all comparable; so little so, that in the naval contracts for cordage, there was uniformly introduced a stipulation that the supplies of rope, cable, &c., should be fabricated of the imported article. This difference between the home and foreign hemp did not result, perhaps, from any intrinsic inferiority, but from the mode of its preparation. It was understood that the Russian hemp was all water rotted, whilst that of the West was merely submitted to the more gradual process by exposure to the dew. The latter course was pursued among our brethren of the West, from judicious considerations of health, as the multiplication of stagnant ponds, covered with the vegetable putrefaction of this process, would, undoubtedly, be seriously pernicious to those immediately within their influence. This was, perhaps, one of the blessings of the bill which was to operate so beneficially, in all quarters, by the effect of the proposed bounty.

Mr. H said, he desired to set the gentleman from Kentucky right in another particular; before he took his seat. He has informed the Committee that the duty on coarse cottons operates as a protection on the cotton-growing States, and was so solicited and considered by our representatives when it was imposed. My lamented predecessor (Mr. LOWNDES) did not so consider it in the masterly view he took of this subject, and it was a part of the scope of the luminous argument he offered on the tariff of 1820 (one of the greatest and brightest of his efforts) to show the impolicy of this duty in its direct effect on our East India trade. But it is altogether beyond my scrutiny, said Mr. H., to discover how this duty on coarse manufactured cottons can operate as a protection to South Carolina and Georgia, when we do not dread the raw material in any shape in which it may be introduced. Indeed, we are so often upbraided for estimating too lightly this, and the duty of three cents on the unfabricated article, that I am disposed, in the name of the State I represent, to offer a fair compromise—relieve us from the overwhelming pressure of the restriction of the bill under consideration, and we will cheerfully surrender this vast protection upon our cotton, and every other which may be supposed to favor our agricultural products. The true meaning, however, of the term (said Mr. H.) in the vocabulary of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, of protection, throughout his whole bill, is prohibition, and this the nation will at last understand.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, again took the floor, in reply to Mr. HAMILTON. He now understood it to be admitted, that the hemp of Kentucky, is, on its first trial, ten per cent stronger than the hemp of Russia—but, it was contended, became weaker by use. In this respect, Mr. T. said, if the fact were as stated, the hemp resembled some arguments he had heard—they seemed strong at first, but become weaker and weaker the more they were tried. Mr. T. had some doubt of the fact respecting the hemp, however, not believing that there could be any thing in the climate of the country which, after producing the strongest hemp, should take away its strength. Mr. T. replied to the suggestion of the gentleman, that, if this duty on bagging were not laid, he would be willing to take off the duty on cotton. If he did that, Mr. T. said, he would venture to say, that the gentleman's constituents would take him out of this House, and send somebody here, in his place, who would put the duty on again. With regard to the local feelings and interests, against the influence of which the gentleman from New York protested the other day, Mr. T. said, that no man could discharge his duty to the public at large, if, in making out a tariff of duties, he did not look to local as well as general interests. The tariff cannot be equalized unless by doing so, and it was the duty of a statesman, to look to such considerations. To form an equitable tariff, the pressure must be lessened in some places, and increased in others, &c.—and, after all that can be done is done for this purpose, a change of prices would still make a change of pressure. The amount of the existing duty, Mr. T. argued, had been overrated: it was but twenty-six per cent. and gentlemen who had made it amount to more, had only mistaken the figures with which they set out in their calculation. The whole country was interested, he further contended, in encouraging the production of hemp, it being an article as necessary in war to the maintenance of the navy as the hulls or any other parts of the ships composing it. Mr. T. here entered into a calculation which, he said, would show what the mighty burden of this tax on the cotton planters amounted to. The price of cotton, he said, is higher than that of bagging and bale rope; but, in selling cotton, the bagging and bale-rope are all weighed and sold as cotton. Cost what it may, it brings to the grower the price of cotton, and is, in point of fact cotton, to him. Five yards of bagging are sufficient for a bale of cotton, weighing about two and a half pounds each yard; add to this six pounds of bale-rope, and there is a total of something like twenty pounds weight. Say that the cotton sells for twenty-five cents—and in his country they never got it for less, though they used it of rather inferior quality—multiply the weight of bagging, &c., by the price of the cotton, and it would be seen that the cotton planters make, upon every bale of cotton, three dollars clear! That is, upon every bolt of bagging which they use, they actually make a clear profit of twenty dollars. There could, therefore, be, and there actually was, no cause of complaint on the part of the cotton planters. Mr. T. here took a comparative review of the progress of the duties on the importation of hemp, and of tarred and untarred cordage. Beginning at the year 1785, when the duty on hemp began at sixty cents per 112 pounds, and on cables, tarred and untarred, at seventy-five and ninety cents, he came down to the present time, when the duty on tarred cordage is three cents per pound, and that on untarred cordage is four cents per pound. All the protection hitherto given by law, Mr. T. went on to argue, had been tide-water protection. Of this he did not complain. All that he asked was, that some little protection should be extended to the industry and capacity for production of other parts of the country. With reference to the duties on sugar, rice, and cotton, imported, whether they were intended to protect the home manufacture of those articles, was, Mr. T. argued, of no importance. The matter of fact is, that they do encourage it—and the fact is all that is material. The whole people of the United States are taxed to protect the sugar grower, the cotton planter, the rice grower, and the indigo maker; and he might go further, and he considered it no more than fair and just that some little protection should be given to the staples of other parts of the country.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, rose to correct a part of the calculation of the gentleman from Kentucky. As to the cotton consumed within the United States, it is true, that the bag is sold with the cotton. But the amount consumed in the United States is but forty thousand bales, while the quantity exported amounts to six hundred thousand bales. In the foreign market the bagging is not weighed. The merchant pays for the cotton alone, deducting the bagging. The gentleman, therefore, would get nothing by this argument. The duty on foreign sugars, Mr. B. said, could have no weight in this discussion. The very reasons on which the gentleman supported an increase of the duty on hemp, would justify a proposition for a prohibitory duty on sugar; for the fact was, that the State of Louisiana alone, was capable of producing more sugar than can be consumed within the limits of the United States.

Mr. McKIM, of Maryland, went into a calculation to show that the duty of six cents per square yard was not all that was laid by the bill in the article of cotton bagging, because the width of the bagging being forty-two inches instead of thirty-six inches, the overplus in width made the duty on the running yard amount to seven cents; and the third section of the bill laid on all goods, for which bounty was paid by a foreign country, a duty equal in amount to such bounty; and by the laws of Great Britain, a bounty equal to about three cents the running yard was given to the manufacturers of this article—the bill, therefore, laid a countervailing duty of this amount, which, added to the former seven cents, made the total duty per running yard laid by this bill on the article of bagging, amount to ten cents, instead of six. So he understood the operation of the bill—and he applied to the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures to explain.

Mr. TOB, in reply, said, that the fact of a bounty being laid by Britain on the article was one of the strongest arguments to show the propriety of our protecting it. He disavowed any intention on the part of the committee, to make the total duty more than six cents—and said that, if the gentleman from Maryland would move any amendment producing that result, it should have his assent.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said that the object of this duty was distinctly avowed: it was not to protect manufactures that existed, but to assist in bringing them into existence, and the price of doing so was to be laid on all the cotton-growing States. But, if Russia could raise and export hemp to Scotland; and they could manufacture and export it to this country, and, after all charges, could undersell Kentucky, with all its advantages of hemp land, it was certainly not owing to a want of protection, but a want of skill or proper management. Mr. C. then stated, from personal knowledge, the average amount of bagging required by a round bale to be from five to five and a half yards, and the average price of imported bagging to be thirty-five cents, making the amount of bagging on a bale amount to one dollar and seventy-five cents. But the bagging, though sold with the bale, did not bring the first cost, and there was, besides, by custom, a deduction of two pounds, for which nothing was paid. The weight of bagging on a bale was about ten pounds; so that eight pounds only was paid for, and this at about fourteen cents. But, if such was the case now, what would it be if this bill should pass? The operation of it would be to impose, for the benefit of Kentucky and Ohio, a tax on all the cotton-growing States of not less than $300,000 a year. Mr. C. then went into an argument to show (in answer to Mr. MARVIN) that the cotton grower was the real consumer of the article. Its price regularly increased till it got to his hands, and as regularly decreased till it got to the manufacturer, who would allow little or nothing for it.

Mr. C. repeated the offer to give up the protecting duty of three cents per pound on cotton, if gentlemen would give up the duty on bagging. To which he added a further pledge that the duty which was urged to be a bounty on sugar, should also be surrendered, if they might only escape this (he had almost said,) cursed tariff. He put a case, of two tradesmen, a saddler and a hatter, who had equal capital, but unequal business; and asked, what would be thought of a Government that would tax the one to pay it to the other, in order to equalize their condition? This, he said, was in substance, what was now proposed to be done between different sections of the Union. And he ended, by intimating, that, although the people of the South were orderly and submissive to the authority of their Government, there might be a point, to which, if prohibitions should be pushed, they would be resisted.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. COOK combatted the justice of the objection of the gentleman last up to the principle of the bill. If two sections of country enjoyed, by nature, unequal advantages, and legislation interfered in aid of that which had the greater, it ought certainly not to refuse to aid, in an equal degree, that which had the lesser advantages. He said that the protecting duty on cotton had encouraged the cultivation of that article until from nothing it had arisen to such a height, as not only to supply the entire demand of the whole United States, but to export double the amount consumed in the country. It was not very surprising that now, after having been placed upon a solid foundation by the bounty, the cotton growers should be willing to give it up—they could afford to do so. And nothing could be a greater proof that the duty was a direct premium than the very offer with so much readiness to relinquish it. Mr. C. then stated the total amount of cotton raised annually in the Southern States, the bounty on which, at three cents per pound is $950,000, which sum was paid to the growers by the consumers. Now the whole duty proposed by this bill to be laid on bagging, would amount only to $66,000. So that, while the other States paid the cotton-growing States $950,000, all they asked in return was, that those States should pay $66,000. The cotton too, consumed in the United States, was used by the poor, in the form of coarse cottons. And the growers of hemp too, though respectable, as well as a part of the yeomanry of the country, might be classed in general among the comparatively poor. The proposed duty, therefore, would be paid by the rich for the benefit of the poor.

Mr. GURLEY, of Louisiana, said, that the bill was professedly brought in to protect, not only the manufactures, but the agriculture of the country; but if this was the kind of protection intended, he thought it was of an extraordinary kind; and the severest dispensations of Providence, in the form of bad crops and unfavorable seasons, were not to be compared with the severer which threatened the Southern agriculturists from the bill upon the table. In reply to what had yesterday fallen from the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) he would remark that he returned to that gentleman, and his constituents, his hearty thanks for their protection and patriotism, as displayed in 1815—but he must say, should the bill pass, their protection and their patriotism would prove to have been to little purpose—they would take back (and he must be allowed to say, with usurious interest,) all the benefit they had bestowed.

The gentleman from Illinois had remarked that figures could not lie: he would, therefore, show by figures what would be the operation of the bill on the agriculturists of the cotton-growing country. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in 1822, it appeared that there was raised that year in the United States 144,000,000 lbs. of cotton, which, when made into bales, weighing on an average about 300 lbs. a piece, would make 522,829 bales. The bale required on an average seven square yards of bagging, which would give 3,657,803 yards necessary for baling.

By the tariff of 1816, a duty was allowed on this of three cents a yard, producing an amount of $109,734 09. Might he not ask if this was not sufficient? But, if the bill should pass, the duty (which ought fairly to have been avowed as amounting to ten cents a yard) would amount to $240,468. God save me, said Mr. G., from such protection as this! But this manufacture is already protected to the amount of twenty-five per cent.; and a manufacture that could not stand with such a protection was not worthy of being upheld. The protection now proposed would, instead of twenty-five, be sixty-three per cent. ad valorem. Mr. G. concluded with a general remark, that there never was a bill presented to the House which was likely to produce such extensive effects on the future condition of the country as this.

Mr. SANDFORD, of Tennessee, was opposed to the duty, as diminishing the revenue, on the importance of which to the support of Government he made a few observations. This article of bagging had produced, heretofore, an amount in revenue of $100,000, which would be lost if a duty was laid amounting to a prohibition. The agricultural, mechanical, manufacturing, and commercial classes, were all united by reciprocal ties. If one duty was laid for one of them, and another for another, we should go on until the whole revenue was swept away; and who was prepared to go home to his constituents and tell them he had so legislated away the revenue, and now resort must be had to direct taxes? The manufacturers of Kentucky, on a late occasion, in which the drought obstructed communication, had raised the price of bagging to 45, 50, and even 60 cents a yard, though they afterwards carried the same goods to New Orleans and sold it at 25 cents. This led the cotton growers to make split mats for covering their cotton, and to fabricate ropes out of white oak bark instead of hemp, or bind up their bales with split hoops. He mentioned this as a hint to gentlemen not to go too far in laying duties on bagging. The public debt was stated to be ninety millions; he feared, as matters were going, we should not raise, by revenue, one million next year.

Mr. BUCHANAN said that much embarrassment had arisen from uncertainty in the amount per cent. to which the bill contemplated to raise the present duty on bagging. Some gentlemen stated it to be 25 per cent., others 30, others 80, others, again, over 100. He said he was favorable to the cause of manufactures, and thought it ought to be protected; but not by going faster than the growth of manufactures would warrant. He thought, as the farmers of the West had no market for their grain, that their hemp ought to be brought into fair competition with that of foreigners; this was as far as he would go. He was willing, on the article now under consideration, to vote for a duty of 10 instead of 20 per cent. additional. He was informed that 4½ cents per square yard would be equal to a total duty of 30 per cent., and this he should move, if the present duty was not carried.

Mr. TON said that if the gentleman from Pennsylvania voted throughout on this principle, he must vote against the whole bill. The duty it proposed on woollens was 60, and that on cottons more than 150 per cent. And as to the duty now under consideration, it amounted already to 80 or 100 per cent. by the tariff of 1816; if the gentleman wished to have it 30, he must move for a repeal of the laws now existing. Six cents was the very sum recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. The duty on cotton had raised it from nothing to a production of $24,000,000 in value in 1822, and, though last year it was something less, in weight, it was larger in the amount of value. The grain-growing States having grain which the English will not buy, ask, in this bill, a protecting duty of 70 or 80 per cent.; and all the cotton growers object to it, because it may, by possibility, bear hard on them; but the probability was directly the reverse. Navigation had been protected, and the price of it had fallen, instead of rising; coarse cottons had been protected, and the consequence was the same; and so it would prove with cotton bagging. This was not theory, but fact and experiment. But supposing that for one year they should pay a little higher, was not this better than dependence? Had they forgotten the last war, and what they had to pay, in consequence of having depended on foreigners?

Mr. RANKIN then went into a statement, to show, on the same ground with Mr. McKIM, that the real duty paid would be ten cents, and not six. Besides which, by the act of March 1, 1823, there is an additional duty of ten per cent. to be paid when the article enters the United States.

Mr. TOL rose to correct this statement. The 10 per cent. in that act, was only 10 per cent. on the amount of duty; and even this was taken off, as respects England and most other countries.

Mr. RANKIN then resumed his calculation; the result of which went to show that the duty would amount to 70 per cent.; and that the State of Mississippi alone would have to pay $25,000 of it. The protecting duty on cotton, he also argued, was no equivalent.

Mr. BUCHANAN replied to Mr. Tol, and said he was sorry the gentleman was willing to risk, as he said, the whole bill on such a desperate hazard as the passing of this duty—a duty, he was prepared to show, greater than that on any other article in the whole bill. He approved the duty on hemp, and was willing to make that on bagging equal to it. He thought the proposed duty out of proportion, and much greater than needful. He censured the implied threats of resistance thrown out by a gentleman from Georgia. Such language tended to disunion, and ought to be repressed. Yet he believed that Congress might go so far (in proposing, for instance, a direct land tax for the support of manufactures) that the people would rise in their majesty, and overwhelm the act, factories, and all. By going too far, gentlemen only incurred the danger of reaction.

Mr. CLAY then rose and said that it had not been his intention to engage in any discussion on the details of the bill; but this was one in which his own district was so specially interested, and its provisions had now been attacked from so unexpected a quarter, that he should hold himself culpable if he refused to answer. He would, therefore, say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, if this article would not bear the duty proposed to be laid upon it, there was not an article in the bill that would.

The great articles which it was proposed to protect, were cotton, wool, hemp, and iron—but if the country could manufacture any article whatever, that article certainly was cotton bagging. Having a personal acquaintance with the mode of its manufacture, he begged to state a few of the facts respecting it to the House. The build-ings in which it was conducted were of the slightest and cheapest kind, much resembling rope-walks; the hands employed in spinning were, for the most part, small negro boys, and a few negro girls. The weavers are all either negroes or common laborers; and such is the facility with which the manufacture can be extended, that, if the bill shall pass, I am willing to pledge myself, said Mr. C., in any form, that, within twelve months, twenty millions of yards can be produced, and almost without a special effort. I am well acquainted with the article, and it is one which, of all others, I should select to illustrate the propriety of the principles of the present bill. Who are our competitors in the manufacture? The weavers of Inverness and Dundee, two small towns in Scotland; before the war they had the entire monopoly of this article. During the war, a portion of our domestic labor was directed to this article, and, as might be expected, the manufacture being in its infancy, the prices first demanded were very high—after the close of the war, the factories still continued—but, in a languishing condition; till by the joint competition of the American and the Scotch manufactures, they were completely prostrated. No sooner was this effected, than immediately the price was raised upon the cotton grower; and the extra price then paid would be more than equal to ten years protection of our own fabric. What is it, on the general principles of political economy, that secures an abundant supply of any article made, and its good quality? It is competition. And the real question now before Congress is, whether these men of Inverness and Dundee shall continue to have the monopoly, or whether there shall be an American competition to counteract them? The gentlemen ask, what is to hinder the competition at present? Why cannot we now make the article? I reply to them—that it is only for want of a certain and a steady market, guarded against the sudden influx of goods sent into it from abroad for the very purpose of prostrating our manufactures. The Scotch merchant reasons in this way—if I can, by selling my goods for one year at half or a quarter of their value, or by throwing them away altogether, secure a monopoly of those goods for ten or for twenty years, I shall, on the whole, be a gainer. But, if it is asked, how a sudden influx at a low price can so soon destroy the American manufacturer? the answer is not difficult. It is to be found not only in his comparatively small capital, but in the character of our people, which has in it a mixture of impatience with its activity. They soon become disgusted and discouraged with a business that is not immediately productive; and, in this particular manufacture, the persons employed are so easily turned to some other branch of industry, that, unless a steady market is secured, the establishments can have no permanency or success. But, from my knowledge of this manufacture, I now assert, allowing the present average price to be thirty cents, that if the proposed encouragement is given, in less than twelve months the American will be furnished at a lower rate than the Scotch article.

Something was said about the nature of the American hemp. It is true, that a large portion of that now raised is dew-rotted—but, in the State of New York, and other parts of the Union, as well as in Kentucky and Ohio, much is also water-rotted. And there is not a doubt, that, if protection be given, enough could be obtained for all uses, both maritime and manufacturing. The quantity required was not so very great—a yard of bagging weighs only a pound and an half. So that, allowing four millions of yards to be made, only six millions of pounds weight of hemp is needed. But there is another improvement lately discovered in the preparation of it, by which the necessity of both dew-rotting and water-rotting is completely done away with—and that is, by suffering it to remain one year in stack; a process takes place which renders the hemp, at least in texture and appearance, equal to any of the Russian. Besides all which, late improvements have been introduced into the dressing, which supersede either rotting or stacking.

Mr. C. then went into a calculation to show that the estimate of the rate per cent. stated by some of the gentlemen in opposition, was incorrect.

But what, sir, is the principle on which the gentleman from Pennsylvania means to go? He will protect our manufactures as soon as we are able without protection to go on with the manufacture. Sir, protection comes first in the order of nature; it is while a thing is in feeble infancy that it needs protection. If the gentleman is going to wait till the American manufactures, operated against by the legislation of the universe, opposed by foreign Governments, resisted by foreign capital, combined against by foreign companies, and towns, and cities, in every part of Europe—shall, unaided, attain to strength and vigor before he will protect them; he will never have the opportunity, or, if he have, his protection will be as thankless as it will then be unnecessary. Sir, it not only can happen, but it has happened—Dundee and Inverness have driven America off the field. They prostrated us in 1816 and 1817, and they had the undisputed monopoly of our whole market till 1822, and they knew how to use it too.

But this may happen even where there is no hostile design against our establishments. The market failing him in Europe, the European manufacturer finds an accumulation of goods upon his hands; and this is the market in which he has the best chance to dispose of them; he pours them into our auction rooms, and the effect is just as baneful as if it were done out of the most determined hostility. Gentlemen seem to wish this state of things to continue—they would leave the monopoly where it is—leave us dependent on a little Scotch town. We, sir, wish to destroy that dependence by setting up an American competition.

Mr. C. here referred to a letter from a person of competent information at Lexington, which stated, on the revival of manufactures, in 1822, a million of yards of bagging had been made there, and had reduced the Scotch price from thirty to twenty cents.

Mr. OWEN attributed inconsistency to gentlemen who first deprecated sectional feelings and sectional discussions, and then immediately referred to their own State and district. He accused the chairman of the Committee of Manufactures of some want of candor in evading the objection of the gentleman from Maryland; he ought to have declared at once what would be the operation of the bill. Mr. O. then recapitulated the statement, which went to make the duty ten cents, and sixty per cent., which he reduced to a rule-of-three statement—if three cents give twenty per cent., what will ten cents give? He summed up the policy of the bill as amounting to this, that the East and the West must co-operate, and the South must submit and contribute. He reprobated this policy, as not calculated for the benefit of the whole Union. He said it was a mere calculation of shillings and pence. The manufacturers in one district said to each other, we have got such and such a capital. If we can levy a contribution on the other States, we may get so much added to it, and this will enable us to get more still. He could not believe that a majority of the people of the United States were disposed to favor capital vested in money at a sacrifice of that which was vested in labor.

On motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, the Committee rose, and, having obtained leave to sit again, the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 17.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 22d of January ultimo, in relation to the loss of a sum of money by the Receiver of the Land Office at Vandalia, in the State of Illinois, by the robbery of the bank at that place, made a report adverse to granting any relief to the said Receiver on account of the loss aforesaid; which report was laid on the table.

Mr. RANKIN, from the same committee, to which was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill of this House, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida," reported the agreement of the committee to the said amendments, with an amendment, and the bill and amendments were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill giving the consent and sanction of Congress to a certain act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida; which bill was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time on Friday next.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of J. Ottramare; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Elijah Van Syckel; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, also reported a bill for the relief of Benjamin Desobry; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKIM, from the same committee, reported a bill to extend the right of deposite in public or other storehouses, on certain conditions, and with certain privileges, to other goods besides wines, teas, and distilled spirits; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CADY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, made a report on the petition of Jonas Duncan, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ANDREW STEVENSON, by leave of the House, presented a memorial and remonstrance of sundry merchants and other citizens of Richmond and Manchester, against the alteration in the tariff of duties, as contemplated by the bill now pending before this House, to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. TOMLINSON, in relation to the execution of a resolution for erecting a tomb to General Wooster, was taken up, and agreed to.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. STORRS, calling for information relative to the affairs of the Bank of the United States, was taken up and agreed to.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. WHITTLESEY, respecting the expenditure of appropriations for procuring timber for the Navy, was taken up.

In support of this resolution, Mr. WHITTLESEY called the attention of the House to the several acts providing for the permanent increase of the Navy. No late report had been made to the House of the amount of expenditures under these acts, and what he wished to ascertain was, what portion of those appropriations remain unexpended, in order to be able to decide whether a portion of those unexpended appropriations, if any, could not be diverted to defray the cost of building the sloops of war, for providing which a bill has come to this House from the Senate.

The resolution was then agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for holding an extra session of the district and circuit courts, in the State of Ohio.

The resolution laid on the table yesterday, by Mr. WRIGHT, was taken up, read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill to amend the several acts respecting duties on imports.

The question pending from the last day of sitting, being on the motion of Mr. BRENT to strike out the clause imposing a duty of six cents per square yard on cotton bagging imported—

Mr. McDUFFIE commenced a speech of half an hour, in favor of striking out this clause of the bill, by stating the grave and solemn feelings with which this discussion impressed him, however slight the subject might, at first view, appear. He perfectly agreed, he said, with the honorable Speaker, that, in the legislation of this country, the most scrupulous regard should be had to the general harmony; but he put it to the Speaker whether it was not the introduction of such a bill which was like to disturb that harmony, rather than its discussion, &c. By the course of this discussion, said Mr. McD., we are admonished that this subject does not belong to the Government of the United States. What is the question before us? It is not a question for providing for the common defence and general welfare, or for maintaining the independence of the country. It is not a question which is urged upon us on national grounds at all, but it is a question distinctly arraying against each other the interests of two different sections of the Confederacy. All the arguments by which the proposed duty is supported have been, therefore, and necessarily must be, of a sectional character. When gentlemen are attempting, by legislation, to affect the interests of two sections of the Union relatively to each other, how can they throw upon us the responsibility of that feeling which the discussion may excite? But, Mr. McD. said, however he might feel on the occasion, he would not permit his feelings to enter into the discussion. He should appeal to the judgment, candor, and liberality of the Committee; and, if the impolicy of the proposed tax could not be sustained by argument, on that appeal, he would abandon altogether his opposition to it.

Adverting to the suggestion that the culture of cotton has been brought into existence and sustained by protecting duties, Mr. McD. said, with whatever pleasure he listened to the arguments of gentlemen, and their statements of facts, his patience almost forsook him when this strange position was attempted to be maintained. To tell him that the culture of cotton ever had been protected by the legislation of the Government, was to insult his understanding. Estimating the average value of cotton, where it is grown, at twenty-five cents, the duty on the importation of foreign cotton being three cents per pound, was in fact only twelve and a half per cent. ad valorem, less than the average duty laid on all other objects for the purposes of revenue alone, and could therefore not be regarded, either in intention or in fact, as a protecting duty. The fact was, that, from the moment its culture sprung into existence in this country, it had defied all competition—there never had been a moment in which it would not have defied competition with the cotton of any country on earth. Was cotton raised, in the beginning, for the use of our own manufactories, or for any purpose in which foreign cotton could come in competition with it within the United States? No. From the beginning it had been raised for exportation. The duty did not operate upon the culture of cotton any more effectually than if it did not exist. A bounty on exportation only could afford any protection to the cultivation of it, and he concluded this part of his observations, by repeating that the cotton of the country never has been protected.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

But, Mr. McD. continued, the Speaker had laid down a principle in respect to the manufacture of cotton bagging which, in his view, established the impolicy of protecting this article, viz: that it required but simple and unexpensive machinery, and that establishments for the manufacture of it would be of rapid growth; and he had further said, that, if this bill were passed, the Western country would in one year be able to furnish, if necessary, twenty millions of yards of the article. Now, what is the principle on which protecting duties are justified? What is this principle, as assumed by the Speaker himself? What is the principle on which such duties have been heretofore advocated on this floor and everywhere else? It is, that the manufacture proposed to be protected requires large investments of capital, complicated machinery, length of time to bring it to perfection, &c., which causes require protection, to prevent the manufacture from being prostrated in its infancy. In the present case, no such ground was taken. Even the article of cotton fluctuates in price from ten to twenty cents per pound, and so do all other articles which are employed in commerce. But had it ever been the policy of any country, was it the policy of this, to sustain manufactures against fluctuations such as this, to which all the pursuits of life are liable? No; it was extensive, complicated, and costly manufactures, only, which required protection, &c.

Mr. McD. here examined and controverted the argument that, the consumer, and not the grower of the cotton, paid the duty on the bagging. The price of cotton depended, he argued, on the competition in foreign markets, and not on the cost of the bagging in which it is baled; if the bagging were to cost a hundred dollars for each bag, it would not raise the price of our cotton abroad, because foreign cotton would, when it began to rise above a certain value, come into successful competition with it. There could be no doubt, he said, that the whole additional cost of the bagging would fall on those who make the cotton.

The argument of the Speaker, that the advantage of this duty would be reciprocal, by the cotton of the South being received in the West in exchange for the bagging, Mr. McD. pronounced to be an illusive calculation, and made some observations to show that the part of the country which he represented was already tributary to Kentucky for her produce, for which his constituents paid in specie, and not in cotton, &c. The tax would be an accommodation of the West wholly at the expense of the South, if it even enabled them to supply the bagging. But, he added, that the South could not take their bagging. The expense of its transportation from Kentucky would be two or three times as great as that of its transportation from Dundee or Inverness, and that alone would give the latter an advantage over the former, unless the duty on importation should amount to an actual prohibition.

It had been already well remarked, that the proposition for this duty introduces a principle into legislation which never existed before here, and which, he ventured to say, had never before been introduced into the legislation of any country on the face of the earth. What is it? The protection of manufactures? No; not the protection, but the creation of manufactures. He called upon gentlemen to show, in the history of the world, an instance in which any nation had passed a law to create a new sort of industry—to give being to what did not already exist. If this was an article of primary necessity, in a national view, or connected with the defence of the country, &c., he would go as far as any one in support of it. But, as a question of political economy, he argued, you can only protect what exists. Here, he said, was an issue between hemp and cotton. What is cotton? A large item in commerce; it has formed, for a number of years, on an average, one-third part of the exports of the country. It is an article of weight, and bulk also, and it had, therefore, contributed one-third of all that our commerce has done to support the naval power of the country. And now Congress were called upon to adopt a system which was to strike from existence, that item, and, indeed, every other article of exportation—for, he contended, on the principles of this bill, Congress could not stop until every article of consumption was protected. And what, said he, will be the result? You annihilate the commerce of the United States. The principles of this bill went to an extent never before proposed. In reference to the particular article now under consideration, the House was called upon to jeopardize the great interests of the cotton growing country—to sacrifice an interest which had contributed to the wealth of the Union, and mainly to the growth of the commercial emporium of the United States, upon a miserable calculation of hemp and cotton bagging, which never had any place in the productive commerce of the country. If there was any value in the policy of protection, let it be confined, at least to what exists. Let us hold fast to the sources of our wealth, the means of our revenue, instead of attempting to protect that which has no existence.

After replying to the argument of the Speaker, respecting the effect of competition, and contending that the argument was fatal to this very duty,

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. McD. called upon gentlemen from those States which have no particular interest in the article under discussion, invoking them, by the highest considerations, to interpose to preserve one interest of this country from being sacrificed to the other. He trusted they would decide upon it justly, and without regard to any principle of compromise. He knew there were some members of the House who were disposed for the protection of existing manufactures, who would not vote for this; and he trusted that a general odium would not be cast on the bill by retaining in it such clauses as this, which do not properly belong to it.

The example of Great Britain had been referred to in debate, as to the policy of protecting domestic manufactures. To the argument afforded by her example, Mr. McD. replied, that, if we look at the population of that country, we shall find that her agriculture will not sustain one-third part of her population. What, then, is the principle on which she protects manufactures? The principle of absolute necessity. Strike away her manufactures, and you annihilate the nation—she is gone—her people have perished. Seven millions of her inhabitants cease to exist, if her manufactures are destroyed. It is with her a question of life and death; and many of the sacrifices she makes are the result of this necessity. Can arguments of this sort apply to us, with our almost unbounded territory, sparse population, &c.?

Mr. McDUFFIE concluded his observations by saying that he hoped that gentleman who engaged in this discussion would at least treat it with a gravity becoming its importance. The chairman of the Committee of Manufactures and the gentleman from Kentucky on his left (Mr. TRIMBLE) seemed really disposed to make a frolic of this discussion. Mr. McD. entreated them to consider it more gravely, and treat it in a manner more becoming the great interests which were at stake. If the naval power and commerce of the country were to be sacrificed and entombed here, in this bill, he hoped the House would go through the ceremony in a garb becoming the occasion—he trusted that, at least, they would not treat it with insult and mockery.

Mr. MARVIN, of New York, rose to add something to the few remarks which he had made on this subject, the other day. He entered into a train of reasoning, which he pursued to some length, to show that the consumer of the cotton, and not the cotton grower, actually pays the duty on the bagging, whether it be consumed abroad or at home—principally in reply to the remarks of Mr. COBB, made yesterday. Having concluded his remarks on this point, he passed on to others.

In reply to the argument of Mr. McDUFFIE, that there is no manner in which the cultivation of cotton can be protected by a bounty, he asked, what does this argument admit? That the Southern States possess facilities for the culture of cotton which enables them to compete with the whole world. If this were so, was there not justice in giving this duty for the benefit of those who were so differently situated as to require the interposition of Government?

It had been said that there is at present no reciprocity in the commerce between the Southern and Western States; that the people of the West do not take the cotton of the South, but in fact drain them of their specie, in payment for produce, &c. But, Mr. M. asked, where is the specie acquired by which the people of the South are enabled to pay for the products of the West? It is taken by the people of the South from the people of the North, for their cotton, and the bagging with it. And what becomes of articles manufactured out of this cotton? Why, they find their way over the mountains, and ask for the specie from the West which is received from the people of the South, to whom it is again paid for their raw cotton. And it is thus that every part of this great Republic is made to contribute to the prosperity, strength and durability of the whole.

Referring to the frank proposition of a gentleman from the South to give up the existing duty of cotton, why, Mr. M. asked, was the gentleman so willing to give it up? Is it not because we have establishments in our own country competent to its manufacture without this protection? And is not this, said Mr. M., an argument, and a powerful one, in favor of the doctrine for which we contend? Pass this bill, said Mr. M.—grant this duty; and if in ten years hence any of us should be deliberating within these walls, on a bill analogous to this, and if the people of the West should be called on by the terms of that bill to make the same sacrifice, and were to be told, as an inducement, “You have been aided and assisted by a duty on cotton bagging,” they too would be able to say to us, as is now said by the cotton grower, we ask you not for this protection—you may take it off as soon as you please—we can live without it. And they would say truly: for, give but protection long enough to establish their manufacture on a stable foundation, and they would be able to stand without your aid; they would ask you for no protection.

Referring to the feature of the bill which proposes to lay a duty on articles imported equal to the bounty which is laid by foreign Governments on their exportation, he said it was the most important feature of the bill. It was intended to protect our manufacturer against the shrewdness and astuteness of the foreign competitor. If there never had been a duty here on cotton bagging we should never have heard of a bounty in Great Britain, &c. Let us propose what duty we may, he said, the foreign Government stands ready to establish a duty to precisely that amount, and hence the importance of the provision, which was the very life of this bill, to meet such policy, &c.

From the argument of the gentlemen from South Carolina, contrasting the condition of England and the United States, Mr. M. drew an argument in favor of this bill, the policy of which was to plant the manufacturer and agriculturist side by side, and make them mutually beneficial to each other, &c.

It had been said that it was not the policy of this Government to encourage by protecting duties the manufacture of articles on which its existence does not depend, but to encourage such as contribute to its wealth, strength, and greatness. What, Mr. M. asked, constitutes the wealth and strength of a Government, unless it be the strength of the arm of its citizens: and if we are to have that wall of defence around us, the interests of our citizens must be sustained—agriculture must be sustained, manufactures must be sustained, and the country must foster its own resources, and not be made tributary to foreign countries. We are told, that if we pass this bill our commerce is gone, and that it is commerce which contributes to our wealth, strength, and greatness. What is that commerce which contributes to our wealth, strength, and greatness? Is it that which brings to us the result of the labor, skill, and industry of every other nation in the known world? Commerce, in this point of light, is one of those necessary evils which must exist—necessary, because we had better be our own carriers than pay other nations for carrying for us. But it is not that sort of commerce that is emphatically the source of the greatness of a country. No: when manufactures are placed on a firm footing; when the agriculturist and the manufacturer shall enjoy equal rights and privileges—when all the interests of the Government shall have been made to contribute to the strength of the whole—when the intelligence of our legislation, and the prosperity of our country are made to bear some proportion to the excellence of our institutions—it is then that the produce of the skill and industry of our manufacturers will seek its market in foreign climes and bring back to us the wealth which is to constitute our strength and greatness. When we have this commerce, which we cannot have until our manufactures are established so as to compete with other countries, then we can expect to derive from our situation all the advantages naturally belonging to it, &c.

Mr. MERCEUR, of Virginia, expressed his concurrence in opinion with the gentleman from South Carolina, that this was a very grave subject; which gravity, he thought, had not been tested. He had been very much astonished at the whole course of the debate, in which it appeared to him that the information which ought to be the only foundation of the debate, was wanting—that is, the real value of the article proposed to be taxed, the amount of the tax, and the effect of the tax, as a prohibitory duty; and, if it should have that effect, the competency of the manufactories of the country to supply the demand for the article thus proposed to be prohibited. For this information, he intimated, he had looked in vain to the Chairman of the Committee on Manufactures, or to the several statements prepared for the use of the House. Disappointed in these sources of information, he had endeavored, from others, to arrive as nearly as possible at the truth. Taking the statement of the Speaker, that the value of the article of cotton bagging in Scotland, whence it is now imported, is 15 cents per yard, and that of the Chamber of Commerce, of New York, that the duty of six per cent, per square yard, added to the countervailing duty, would be equivalent to 60 per cent. on the value of the article, with that of the Chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, valuing the article at 17 cents per yard, Mr. M. came to the conclusion that the value of the article, when subjected to duty here, might be computed at 16½ cents per yard, and that the duty proposed by this bill would amount to 66½ per cent. ad valorem, being an advance of 46½ on the present duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem.

When he came to calculate the amount of this commodity of bagging annually consumed, he made a number of statements and estimates, which, from the number of figures they embrace, we cannot pretend to trace: and, calculating the additional duty proposed upon the bagging necessary to bale this quantity of cotton, he arrived at the amount of tax which this bill would impose on the Southern States, which was of startling amount—say upwards of three hundred thousand dollars.

What, he asked, would be the effect of such a duty? The principles of the gentleman from South Carolina, he said, on this subject, were perfectly sound. But in aid of his arguments, Mr. M. asked, if, in regard to this valuable traffic in cotton, the House was apprized that there are two or three new competitors entering the market of Europe for the supply of this article, of which it is now proposed to tax the exportation? The Constitution of the United States was perhaps too often and unnecessarily introduced into this House: but, he said, in regard to Constitutional law, as well as expediency, we ought, in the execution of the letter of the Constitution, to look to the spirit which dictated it. He said, then, that this House has no right to impose such a duty as this. Does not the Constitution say that no duty shall be imposed on exportation? And what matters it, whether an export duty be laid on the article exported, or on the envelope in which it is enclosed? What should we say, if the Jamaica Legislature were, by a duty on staves, to tax the article exported in the hogsheads, out of which they are composed? Yet this was a parallel case. If such export duties were thus imposed on cotton, Mr. M. went on to argue, the article would be exposed to competition with the product of other countries—at a time, too, when the situation of the country emphatically demanded that the products of our agriculture should be left free to seek a market. Apart from the consideration of expediency, however, he argued that such a duty, operating as a duty on exportation would run counter to the principles of the Constitution, and to every sound exposition of it.

After some other observations as to who actually pays the duty on this article of cotton bagging, Mr. M. said, that no man pretends, at present, at least, that we must exclude all intercourse with the rest of the world, because, at some future period, we may ourselves be able to supply all our wants. With regard to the particular article of bagging, the argument drawn from the reduction of the price of coarse cottons by the prohibitory duty, did not apply. In regard to this manufacture, there were difficulties in the way of it: first, in the growth of the raw material; the gathering it in; making it into tow, the inapplicability of machinery to the spinning of it, &c. Comparing this manufacture with that of cottons, in which a single machine performs the work of four hundred hands, &c., no argument could be drawn from the success of the cotton manufactories to the success of the manufactory of bagging; &c.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

But it had been suggested that we are engaged in a competition with Great Britain, and that our spirit of independence, and our pride, ought to induce us to persist in it; and it had been suggested that the British premium on exportation had been introduced to countervail our duty on the importation of this article. As far back, Mr. M. said, as the British colonial system, and that admirable work, Smith's Wealth of Nations, on which he passed a high eulogy, there was a bounty on the exportation from Great Britain of this very commodity, of one and a half cents per yard! It was a part of the system of Great Britain—for what? Not to protect her home trade, but to force her commodities abroad. Gentlemen had said, if we impose any duty whatever, she will countervail it. But, Mr. M. said, she has not done so in regard to our coarse cottons. That nation, he said, has a system of policy, founded on her actual condition and relations, to which she steadily adheres. Would that we had a system of policy equally stable and consistent! But, he said, he would not now enter into the general question of policy. In regard to the particular item now under consideration, the Northern and Western States were called upon to conspire to restrain the trade of the Southern States in a commodity which God and nature had furnished them the means of producing, and of which they ought not to be deprived by legislation, &c.

Mr. M. said, he had no idea of embarrassing this bill, but intended to vote in the integrity of his heart for such parts of it as he believed to be favorable to the interests of the country. He knew that the majority had the power to force this bill upon the nation: he only hoped that they would exercise their power with some regard to the Constitution, to the organic law, to the form of our Government, and to the interests of the country, &c.

Mr. ABBOT rose to remove an erroneous idea, that the three cents duty on cotton was applied beneficially to the planter. This was not so. The price he obtained, whether in his own market, that of Europe, or in the Northern factories, was regulated by the value of the cotton alone, and not a cent more was obtained, as he showed, on account of the duty.

Mr. BRENT wished to propose to the honorable Speaker one question. That gentleman says we ought to lay this duty, to excite a competition in the United States; but the Committee will immediately perceive that four or five hundred hands are sufficient to make all the bagging that can be consumed in the whole cotton country; and I wish to ask the honorable Speaker, whether it is fair, that the Southern States should be taxed $400,000, to support five hundred Western men?

Mr. CLAY rose and said, he would answer the gentleman with pleasure. In the first place, his honorable friend had entirely mistaken his argument. What I said was, that it was desirable there should be a competition, not between American and American, but between the American manufacturer and the Scotch manufacturer. He is equally mistaken in his fact. He said, I believe, in a former speech, that there was but one factory of cotton bagging in all Kentucky.

[Here Mr. BRENT explained: that he had said that, in 1822, there was but one, according to the report of the census of manufactures, and that in a languishing condition.]

Yes, continued Mr. CLAY, in a most languishing condition, and why? For want of the protection of a parental government. But now there are, I believe, ten, certainly not less than eight, in a single village, in Kentucky. The gentleman is equally mistaken as to the number of hands employed. It is calculated that one able-bodied man can make 1,000 yards of hempen bagging in one year. The largest of the establishments I refer to, has about one hundred hands, and it made 100,000 yards of bagging, and 40,000 yards of baling rope in a year. Here is the datum on which the honorable gentleman can make calculations for himself.

But compare the arguments of the two last gentlemen. One tells us that five hundred hands will make enough of the article to supply the whole of the United States; the other tells us that the whole United States cannot make enough to supply the Southern States. When these gentlemen shall reconcile these two statements, we shall have something more satisfactory to go upon. But, being up, I claim permission to make some reply to arguments adduced by others. The gentleman from South Carolina, who never speaks without illuminating his subject, began, by saying, that the present is purely a sectional question between two portions of the Union, and Congress is called to act as umpire between them. Yet, the gentleman professes to be in favor of some degree of protection being extended to some branches of manufacture. But, if he applies this species of argument to other of the articles enumerated in the bill, it will destroy them each in succession. There is not an article in it that does not principally affect some limited district of the Union. One important article is iron; but that affects only Pennsylvania and New Jersey—(and, I think I heard a faint sound, like asking protection for it, from a part of Virginia.) One of the honorable gentlemen presented a petition from Virginia, last year also, and, when this article comes up, he will tell us that this is a question between the United States and Pennsylvania, and we must be umpires; and so with cotton; and so with every other articles in this beneficent bill. We shall have the Union versus Kentucky, the Union versus Pennsylvania, and so on, till every item is destroyed by umpirage.

But my idea is, that the happiness of a nation is the happiness of the several parts that compose it; that the protection of the several parts of a nation, is the protection of the nation.

I did not say that this manufacture required no

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

capital or skill, but only comparatively none. I know it must have buildings to shelter the hands employed, looms to weave, and implements to spin. But these are all nothing in comparison to what is required in other branches of manufactures. Where slaves are used, the capital is chiefly in slaves and hemp.

The gentleman from Louisiana asks why this manufacture cannot subsist of itself? I'll tell the gentleman. It is because doubly protected and bountied industry can put down industry that has neither bounty nor protection. Britain protects her manufacturer; nay, she is not content with protecting—she superadds to all a bounty to encourage him, and purposely to enable him to prostrate the foreign manufacturer, even in his own market. This is the reason. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina has laid down a proposition to which I assent, but with some qualifications. He says no Government can guard trade against fluctuation. This is true in general; but Government can guard it against all such fluctuations as are the result of legislation in other countries; against such overwhelming fluctuations as are purposely occasioned by the acts of other Governments with a hostile design. We do not ask, we never thought of asking, protection against our own citizens. It is against the foreign manufacturer, protected, encouraged, aided, bountied, by a foreign Government. A steady market is equally desirable to the maker and the consumer of the article. With this, the manufacturer can make some sort of calculation to guide him; but not if he is to guard against the acts of the whole universe of hostile Governments. It is only within the circle of our own glorious Republic that he asks or seeks to have his market made secure; and to this extent his request can be granted him. Cotton growers have had to pay fifty and sixty cents a yard for bagging. Now, from a Charleston price current, it appears the price is twenty and twenty-two. Are not such appalling fluctuations as this, produced by the cupidity of foreign monopolists, to be deprecated alike by planter and manufacturer?

Mr. CLAY said the question before Congress was whether the country shall submit to a Scotch monopoly, or shall raise up an American competition? Surely the cotton growers would be the better for having two instead of one to supply them. He would put a case. Supposing one American manufacturer, or one village or town, had, till now, enjoyed the undisturbed monopoly of this article, (sometimes raising it on the planter to sixty cents a yard,) and it was now proposed to admit some other town into the trade for competition; would not Southern gentlemen listen to the proposal! Would they not hail it with joy? and will they be indifferent to it because the new competitor is in America and the old in Dundee? Or, can it be that gentlemen will be indifferent because the competitor resides in the West?

But, surely, Louisiana was the last that should complain. Cotton bagging goes from Kentucky to that State almost free of all expense for transportation. While Louisiana pays one cent or a cent and a half, Augusta pays four or five cents for transportation, besides the expense of two commission establishments, one in New Orleans and the other at Savannah. Yet, the gentleman from Louisiana continues his attacks upon the bill with a perseverance which plainly shows that, when his constituents chose him, they knew whom they were sending.

I have heard one most extraordinary species of argument used in reply to those urged from the bounty on sugar. It is that the quo animo with which a duty was laid, is to be considered, rather than its actual operation in practice. Sir, what have we to do with the motives of the laws? We have only to inquire, what is the law, and how does it operate?

We have been told that Egypt, that South America, that the West Indies, and Asia, are all beginning to cultivate this plant, (a plant that seems designed by Providence to furnish the clothing of the whole human race.) And so, too, are Virginia and even Illinois—for nature herself is violated by the necessities of suffering industry.

As to the gentleman from Virginia, he is answered by the gentleman from Louisiana. He seems to have complained that certain statements were not laid before the House by the gentleman who introduced this bill; but it was equally the duty of every gentleman to search for information, and to lay it before the House for general advantage. The gentleman from Virginia has done this. But, after all his calculations, the fact will turn out to be, that there are about four millions of yards of bagging consumed annually in the United States. Is it not important to put in motion all the active industry necessary to manufacture this amount, and to provide the materials for its fabrication? It seems to have come to this, that the Southern district of the Union is to separate itself from all the rest, and unite itself with Inverness and Dundee! that the prosperity or distress of Inverness and Dundee are to be the prosperity or distress of the Southern States of this Union. Sir, is it not better that the manufacturers, with whom our brethren are to be so closely united, should reside in the Union, than out of it?

Mr. C. then went into an argument illustrative of the general nature of trade, which always moves in a circle, and showed that the trade between the Western and Southern States, was mutually advantageous, it formed (especially as soon to be promoted by internal improvements) part of the great home system which would build up the strength and prosperity of the Union.

He next replied to the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) who still persists to say that the duty will be, in effect, ten cents on the running yard. I ask him, said Mr. C., whether the three cents allowed by England as a bounty, and met by a countervailing duty on our part, is not honestly to be deducted—for, what does it avail for protection that we lay three cents if England meet this by a bounty to the same amount—our protection is so far neutralized;—it is, therefore, only what is laid over and above this bounty, that can operate as any protection—this on the square yard is by this bill made six cents, but the running yard being six inches wider, it will be exactly seven cents on that yard.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed, that the present item rested on the same principles as the whole bill, and afforded a proper opportunity for the discussion of them, and as the Speaker had taken that course, and had gone into the general policy of the bill, though it would be better at once to take up the general discussion; and being desirous of expressing his views somewhat at large upon it, moved that the Committee rise, but waived the motion at the request of—

Mr. MERCER, who replied to Mr. CLAY, and defended the accuracy of the calculations he had before advanced. The whole duty would amount to 66½ per cent. The present duty was laid when the British bounty already existed, and therefore it was perfectly fair to estimate the proposed increase as relating to the previous duty, on which it was an advance of 46½ per cent. The argument against the duty was rather fortified than weakened by what the Speaker had advanced respecting the British policy; if, through an error in that policy, we were enabled to obtain an article cheaper, shall we not avail ourselves of the advantage? He repelled the assertion, that he and the gentleman from Louisiana, were at war with each other's statements, &c. The commodity taxed, in this case, is but the wrapper to another commodity, the price of which is fifteen cents—while it costs at home thirty cents a yard, in Europe it was useless unless to send to the paper mill. The wrapper was never valued at all.

The honorable Speaker counselled the House to union. That is, virtually, to submit to the whole bill; and he seemed very desirous to strike out the first section, in order to go into the general argument. The gentleman from New York also seemed to participate in this anxiety; but, said Mr. M., what is the tariff? What degree or description of knowledge, I will not ask, does it, but rather does it not, require? A knowledge of the whole globe, of geographical and statistical details, of every variety and extent—a knowledge of the laws of every foreign State—of the policy of every foreign Government—the commercial history of our own country, and from the very earliest periods, and the rise and progress of every different branch of its trade—without knowledge like this, we must legislate in the dark. It is, above all, necessary to know how every part of our present revenue arises, and the competency of the country for each particular branch of manufacture. He would ask, whether it was contemplated that the whole system of encouragement should go into operation at once? And, if it did, whether it would not produce an immediate rise in the price of labor? He went into an argument to show, that the effect of the bill would be injurious rather than beneficial to the West. He remarked on the difference between Russian and American hemp, and contended that the former could not be excluded by the duty proposed to be laid on it. He defended the justice of the complaints against a bill which went to increase the poverty of the poor, and to increase the wealth of the rich—to beggar the country from which he and his companions in opposition came. Was it to be wondered at, that they should resist and complain?

As to increasing the home demand for agricultural products, if all the manufacturers of England were brought here, it would but little affect the price, except in their own immediate neighborhood, and there it would only convert grain fields into gardens for pulse. He compared the objection of the Speaker to that of a soldier, who, having taken a captive, and being offered a reward for the number of heads he should bring into camp, complained of the impediment of the captive's cravat, and asked him to take it off, that he might cut his head off with greater convenience. He compared the precipitancy of our legislation, on fiscal subjects, with the great caution of the British House of Commons, where committees, both of merchants and manufacturers, were always heard at the bar before the least alteration was made in a single tax that was to affect commerce or manufactures. All that its opponents could hope, was, to mitigate the harshness of the bill; but he was glad that it did not divide the whole country by one great geographical line; he was happy to find some of the members from New England coming forward to aid their brethren in the South; it would prevent much of that alienation of affection, which might otherwise take place.

He doubted whether the bill was not against at least the spirit of the Constitution. That instrument expressly forbade a tax upon exports. No nation had ventured to tax them but England, and even she went no farther than a certain amount. If the Southern States were afflicted by the visitation of Heaven; if the fly ruined their grain, or bad weather blighted their crops of cotton, they bowed with submission; but it was not to be expected they should submit, in the same spirit, to injuries from the hand of Government, when the laws of their country were turned against them. When Hamilton first proposed the system of domestic manufactures, it was done to soothe the country under the new system of commercial taxation, not to irritate and exasperate it. The bounty imposed by Britain on this article was laid sixty years ago for the benefit of her navy, and not as a counteracting duty. It was natural the people should be more attached to their State governments than the General Government. They are the nearest to the people; most conversant with their immediate interests. They give us our early education, and conciliate to themselves our first political attachments. Let us not do any thing to place the General Government at a greater distance from the affections of the people.

Mr. M. concluded, by saying he was too well assured that he could not stop the progress of the measure one moment, (unless, indeed, the moment be occupied in speaking,) and he desired to see manufactures prosperous and suitably encouraged; but that was only done by guarding them against intrusions and forcible interruption. That was the only kind of protection they needed.

The Tariff Bill.

Mr. BRENT made a few further observations in reply to the Speaker: If the high price asked by the Dundee manufacturers had brought the factories of Kentucky into operation again, and they had been able to reduce the price of cotton bagging from sixty to twenty-five or thirty cents; this was proof that they needed no protection. Why did they not go on? Here was the competition the Speaker desired to see. He then went into a calculation to show that one good hand (not a little negro boy) could make $16\frac{1}{2}$ yards of coarse tow cloth per day; and, allowing for the greater ease of making bagging, could make 25 yards of the latter, which would give 7,875 yards in a year; at which rate the four millions of yards used might be made by 500 hands, and he again asked if Congress would tax the cotton-growing country \$400,000, to support 500 Kentucky laborers?

Mr. BUCHANAN disclaimed the principles advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. MERCER,) he was in favor of the general system proposed by the bill—it was the settled policy of this country—we had advanced from one tariff to another on that principle, and we now had a third, but we should advance with cautious steps, and not injure the kindred interests of agriculture and commerce. He entirely agreed with the honorable Speaker in the sentiments avowed in the close of his speech; there must be a system of mutual concession—we must agree to give and take. He was equally opposed to both extremes proposed; one party said, strike out the duty altogether; to this he could not consent—he would indeed rejoice to see trade perfectly unshackled; but, while other countries surrounded it with protecting restrictions, we must do so too in self-defence. Another party were for raising the duty from twenty to forty per cent.; he thought this too much; we must have some regard to revenue. He was for pursuing a middle course, which, though it might not at once drive the Dundee manufacturer out of the market, would give life and vigor to our own factories, and enable them to compete with him.

Mr. B. then moved to strike out 6, and insert $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per square yard. This he hoped would meet the wishes of both parties: as to the general discussion of the principles of the bill, he hoped it would not be gone into; he had derived more instruction from hearing the details of the bill discussed thus far, than he should have done from listening for a month to long sermons on political economy.

Mr. CAMBRELENG observed, in reply, that he had no inclination to deliver what the honorable gentleman was pleased to call a sermon on political economy; but he must say, that he had listened to many a long speech in the present discussion, which was not on the bill at all; for, if he understood the bill, and the honorable Speaker and the Chairman of the Committee understood it, the gentleman last up certainly did not understand it.

Mr. BRENT expressed the idea that the whole bill, if intended not for protection, but for revenue, was out of order; for then it could not properly be reported by the Committee on Manufactures, but ought to have come from the Committee of Ways and Means. If the question on his motion to strike out could not be put, a question on the passage of the bill itself must be equally out of order.

Mr. BUCHANAN then rose and said, that, in compliance with the request of his friends, rather than the dictates of his own judgment, he consented to withdraw his amendment.

Mr. McDUFFIE rose, in reply to the SPEAKER. He agreed with him, that the principle on which the details of the bill must be settled, was a principle of compromise; but he did not see how the principle applied. The Speaker said that the South asks every thing and gives nothing. Sir, said Mr. McD., we ask nothing—but to be let alone. I defy the gentleman to show any one thing we have asked from this Government, but military protection. Here is a tax proposed upon us of $250,000 a year, not for the benefit of the Union, but of a small portion of it only. The Speaker says that, if this item cannot be assented to, the whole bill must be rejected at once. I cannot perceive the correctness of this conclusion. Hemp requires less protection than almost any other article; its cultivation requires little either of capital or machinery, and, if this must be protected, the argument will go to every article of human consumption.

Mr. CUTHBERT, of Georgia, thought that the motion for rising ought to prevail. The Speaker, while professing to discuss one of the items of the bill, had gone into the whole question, and had brought to bear upon it the whole weight of his eloquence. He had even gone into a justification of the policy of Britain, in her bounty laws—as if this youthful and happy country was to be bound by the policy of the old Governments of Europe, so differently situated. The honorable Speaker had urged the doctrines he advanced with that daring boldness which belongs to him. But, Mr. C. hoped, the market for the cotton of the South was not about to be contracted within a little miserable sphere, instead of being spread throughout the whole world. If they should drive the cotton growers from the only source from whence their means were derived, they would be unable to take any longer their supplies from the West—they must contract their concerns within their own sphere, and begin to raise flesh and grain for their own consumption. The South was already under a severe pressure; if this measure went into effect, its distress would be consummated. Such were the effects of the attempts of man, vain man, to counteract the arrangements of the God of Nature, and by oppressive legislation to deprive his fellow-man of the free and unshackled exercise of the energies of his being.

Mr. CAMBRELENG now renewed his motion for the Committee to rise, and the Committee rose; and, having obtained leave to sit again, the House adjourned.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to which the subject has been referred, by resolution, reported a bill to authorize the legal representatives of the Marquis De Maison Rouge, and those claiming under him, to institute a suit against the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Hugh McCullough, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of George Eichelburger and Frederick Eichelburger, and of certain distillers in King's county, in the State of New York, reported a bill for the relief of certain distillers in the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McLANE also reported a bill for the relief of John Wilmot; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the whole House to-morrow.

Mr. MCCOY from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of Robert Strain, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be made a military road from a point opposite to Fort St. Philip, to Johnston's plantation, as an auxiliary to the defence of New Orleans, reported the same without amendment; and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time limited for the settlement of private land claims in the Territory of Florida," and the amendment reported by the Committee on the Public Lands to the said amendments was read and concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. RANKIN further to amend the said amendments of the Senate, by striking out so much thereof as proposed to insert a fourth section to the said bill. This motion was disagreed to by the House, and the amendments were then concurred in, amended as aforesaid.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a statement of the appropriations and expenditures for the naval service for the year 1823, showing the expenditures under each head, since the 1st of January, 1824, and the unexpended balances on the 1st of February, 1824; which letter and statements were laid on the table.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then again went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDIOT in the Chair,) on the bill to amend the several acts respecting duties on imports.

The question pending from the last day of sitting, being on the motion of Mr. BRENT to strike out the clause imposing a duty of six cents per square yard on cotton bagging imported—

Mr. CAMBRELENG, of New York, rose. He said it was quite unnecessary to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. The motion now pending involved every principle which could be urged in favor of that portion of the bill designed to impose prohibitory or protecting duties. It was not material whether the motion was to strike out one article or fifty—the arguments were similar—the fate of this motion strikes at the principles of the bill as a measure of protection. It matters not what may be the particular condition of any manufacture. The design of this measure is to prohibit the importation of our manufactured supplies—to confer on our own capitalists the exclusive privilege of supplying the country—to extinguish the revenue now derived from these manufactures, and to supply the deficiency by augmenting the duties upon other importations. This is the character of the measure, and these are the principles avowed by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures.

In the progress of our free Government, said Mr. C., it would be well, occasionally, to revert to the principles upon which it was originally founded. The time is seasonable, and while we are agitating this grave question about the peculiar forms of party, it would be well to attend something to the principles of the Government, according to which, our national affairs are hereafter to be administered. No occasion can be more proper for the inquiry—no question can agitate principles more profound. We may differ about our measures of defence—we may cling with devotion to our remnant of State rights; but the measure now proposed involves the rights of freemen—the principles of civil liberty. It is not this or that section, which alone is interested. The question extends wherever free government is valued and understood—to the North, the South, the East, and the West—the gallant West, where I trust, said Mr. C., the principles of civil liberty will remain imperishable as its glory. Should we sanction by our acts the principles now advocated, we should adopt a scheme of government hostile to the spirit of our institutions, and we shall probably not long have occasion to discriminate between forms of government; for, whilst the generous impulses of chivalry may be tempting us abroad to emancipate the world, passions less pure and elevated will be secretly undermining the foundations of our own Constitutional liberty.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) for whose judgment, said Mr. C., I have a high respect, supposes that we are acting upon a measure framed according to ancient usage—that we are graduating the scale of encouragement to our manufactures, and moderately augmenting our imposts—that we are still keeping in view the aggregate interests of our country and our revenue; and such is the character of the measure which was anticipated by the community. But such a measure was never contemplated by the Committee on Manufactures, nor is any such measure now advocated by the chairman of the committee. The character of the measure now proposed is prohibitory. The system contemplated, is to be fashioned after the British model—the bill is framed for the avowed purpose of granting to our capitalists the exclusive privilege of supplying our country with manufactures to the value of millions. Upon this question there is no middle ground. The gentlemen from the West are correct in contending for some reciprocity of these privileges. If the capital of the East is to be employed, so must that of the West. The whole is a scheme of balanced privileges to capital, to borrow an expression—"cutting society horizontally." You must take the whole of it to perfect it. Whatever may be the policy of a system, so long rejected by intelligence, and however feasible the balancing these privileges between the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial interests, may have been in England, the scheme is utterly impracticable here; legislative privileges, designed, as they must ever be in the aggregate, to give capital employment, must be enjoyed almost exclusively in that section of the country where it is most abundant; it is impossible to execute here any plan of balanced legislation which can diffuse its influence, whatever it may be, equally, and justly in the agricultural portions of our country. Even the West must at all times share little advantage from any such legislative compromise. Its operation must always be in our country unequal and unjust; throwing entirely out of view its weight upon the community.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

The honorable Speaker has defied us to show a manufacture or a branch of industry, which has flourished without legislative protection. This cannot be a difficult task, when we see industry springing up in every country, and flourishing too, through causes altogether independent of legislation. But, sir, what has been the history of the very manufacture distinguished by that gentleman's attention—I mean, said Mr. C., the cotton manufacture in England. It was virtually prohibited by the act of 1721—it was persecuted for more than fifty years—because the raw material was not a production of the country, and (very probably) through the avarice of the linen manufacturers, who have always enjoyed the special favor and protection of Parliament. But these persecutions, driving genius to its expedients, produced the labor-saving machine. I refer it to the sagacity of speculative philosophy to establish, whether the bounty of Parliament did most injury to the linen, or its persecutions most benefit to the cotton manufacture. Since this discovery, Parliament has done nothing more than accelerate a revolution in industry, which, through the agency of Mr. Arkwright's invention, would have been gradually but inevitably effected, and in a manner more salutary to the aggregate interests of England, and less injurious to previously existing and ancient establishments.

18th CON. 1st SESS.—50

Much reliance appears to have been placed upon the feeble influence of our laws. We attribute to our act of 1816, what had been previously effected during a long period of restriction and war, when capital, having no employment in commerce, was employed by the labor-saving machine. We are told the price has been diminished since the peace, and so has the value of almost every other manufacture—it is the inevitable consequence of peace.

The honorable Speaker need not trouble himself about the "quo animo" of the act imposing a duty upon cotton. Its cultivation was inevitable, with or without our law; it was the labor-saving machine operating, not only directly, but indirectly upon, and giving an impulse to, the industry of the world; the cause of the cultivation of the cotton of the South lies deeper than the surface of our statute book.

But, we are told, our manufacturers are "crying out to us for protection." This, sir, is not a question about Leghorn bonnets and our other interests of minor importance. Gentlemen would find less difficulty with measures of that character. The origin of the measure proposed, lies in another direction; the question was raised and is persisted in by a portion of our most wealthy manufacturers. If gentlemen will take the trouble to examine the memorials, they will find, among those most prominent in "crying out for protection," the name of Mr. Slater, a very respectable Englishman: one of the oldest and most wealthy manufacturers in the country—one who has enjoyed a very large portion of this legislative protection; but who appears to be still unsatisfied, and, in his memorial, strenuously recommends to us the policy of his native country; although his countrymen, after two centuries experience, pronounce it to be a "system of error or a system of abuse."

But, to the question. What, in the aggregate, is the measure proposed? To prohibit the importation of manufactures and other articles to the value of about thirty millions of dollars. It is true that we are told that a certain portion, but that small, will not be prohibited for some time to come. The bill is admirably framed to accomplish the object in view, which is, as we have been very frankly told by the Chairman of the Committee, to restore our country to that state of unparalleled prosperity it enjoyed during the late war—the only period when, as he says, our manufactures were efficiently protected.

Is not this an undisguised war upon the commerce of our country?

Suppose the Government of Great Britain had, by an Order in Council, threatened thus suddenly to destroy the employments of our mariners, to disturb an existing channel of our industry, and force its capital into manufactures—a measure, in its operation, precisely similar to that now proposed. We should promptly resist it, not only as violating our national rights, but as injuring the aggregate interests of our country. And yet, when we are called upon to perform a corresponding act upon ourselves, we are very gravely told it is salutary and wise.

It is not necessary to advert to the practices of other Governments, nor to indulge in abstract reasoning. The industry of every country must be regulated and protected according to the circumstances and condition of the country. There is nothing in our condition to require that we should, at this late day, search the dusty records of France and England, to mould our laws in absurd conformity to their ancient statutes—nothing to induce us to imitate the venerable follies of every age and every country. There is neither wisdom, honor, nor profit, in a countervailing war of permanent monopolies.

The prosperity of nations depends on their natural advantages, and their constitutional security of property and right. Measures, violating either the one or the other, injure the aggregate interests of the country. Such is the character of the measure now proposed. The manufacturing capital of a nation is formed through the silent and compound accumulations of trade and navigation. When these channels are permitted to contribute their accumulations in a natural way, the three branches flourish together. Such is the actual condition of things in New England, which is, and must continue to be, in defiance of all our laws, the manufacturing district of this country. We may, by our measures, accelerate the transfer of capital from trade and navigation into the channel of manufactures; but we shall not thereby employ the most salutary means of enlarging our manufacturing industry, while we shall essentially injure other and important interests.

There is nothing in the condition of our country calling for such a measure. It is true that in some portions there is distress; but gentlemen have mistaken the remedy. The measure proposed will contribute no relief to the interior: the capital to be employed in these new manufactures is already gathered in the East; and, wherever that accumulation exists, there must be the theatre of the operation of this measure. But the causes of the distress of the interior have also been mistaken. They are, in some measure, incidental to every new country; but they are also to be attributed to errors in legislation—not here, but elsewhere. Wherever laws agitate the security of property and right, confidence is annihilated, industry cannot flourish.

We cannot view the industry of our country in the aggregate, nor contemplate its astonishing march during the last forty years, without feeling satisfied of the wonderful influence of constitutional government upon the industry of nations. It is to this great cause, and not to any of our ingenious regulations, that our rapid national growth is to be attributed. In superintending the operations of industry in a country like ours, embracing every climate, every production, every art, and every science, we should cautiously abstain from any legislative act calculated to agitate its movements, lest we should arrest a wheel or disturb the harmony of so magnificent a work.

But, continued Mr. C., we are told that all branches of industry have an equal claim to protection—that our Southern agricultural interest and our commercial interest, have shared the peculiar favor and protection of Government, while our manufacturing interest has been neglected, and we are now called upon to legislate on the basis of reciprocity.

Although this argument has been urged with invincible gravity, yet, as it regards our agricultural interest, it cannot be deemed worthy a serious reply. Our agricultural interest, in no section of our country, has ever been the subject of this sort of legislative protection. Whatever may have been the speculations of our legislators, our farmers have generally pursued their labors, without being conscious of any advantages derived incidentally from our laws, and certainly without having solicited any such protection.

It is true we have a Committee on Agriculture; but our Committee on Manufactures, while it keeps in motion its wheels and trip-hammers, has kindly condescended to superintend our ploughs and sheep-folds. While other committees are furnished with spacious chambers, the very respectable representatives of our great agricultural interest are consigned to one of the most cheerless cells in this vast labyrinth. Indeed, were it not for a remnant of respect, which we still profess for our agricultural interest, and a scrupulous regard for Parliamentary forms, we might as well abolish the committee. The revenue now proposed professes to favor our Northern and Western agriculture; but before our farmers accept of this protection, it would be well to mark the dexterity of the compromise. The bill proposes to impose additional duties, but not prohibitory, on agricultural productions, to the value of little more than a million of dollars, while it embraces heavy duties, amounting to prohibition, on manufactures required for agricultural use, to the value of about twenty-six millions of dollars. Before the agricultural interest of this country engages in this compact of balanced monopolies, it would be well to refer to the termination of a similar concern in England, where agriculture is prostrated, while manufactures enjoy all the advantages of this legislative compromise.

We are, however, informed, that our commerce is the offspring of legislative bounty and protection. I shall pass over, said Mr. C., less important regulations, to reach those which have been deemed most essential in protecting our navigation—the coasting trade and discriminating duty.

Our ship owners, we are told, have enjoyed a monopoly of our coasting trade.

Now, I would ask, what sort of a monopoly this can be to the ship owners of a nation, whose commerce has always, even in the remotest quarters of the globe, driven British commerce out of its accustomed channels, wherever navigation was free to both nations? A monopoly of our own coasting trade three thousand miles from competition! Had this been the only motive for such a regulation, it would have been the very mockery of legislation. But there was another, infinitely wiser—and one which will probably perpetuate the regulation. It was very naturally supposed, that if foreign ships were employed on our coast,

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

it would more probably be for illicit purposes, than under any expectation of profit in fair competition with an active and more skilful rival. The regulation was necessary to guard our revenue from fraud, and it is presumed to be so still.

But we come now to that mighty foundation of American commerce, the discriminating duty. What was it? An additional duty on merchandise imported in foreign ships of ten per centum, not on the value of the merchandise, but on the amount of the duty. And here let me call the attention of gentlemen to the period when this regulation was adopted—at that time the average rate of duties was not equal to ten per centum ad valorem. Supposing it ten per centum, the discriminating duty would be one per centum on the value of the merchandise. And yet we are now gravely told, that this discriminating duty laid the foundations of our commercial prosperity.

This is the opinion of gentlemen, for whom, said Mr. C., I have a high respect; but I attribute it to other causes than the influence of legislation.

It is, perhaps, travelling a little out of the regular course of argument, to trace the history of our commerce; but I am anxious that the New Bedford memorialists should know what kind of protection the industry of their ancestors enjoyed, and to furnish the honorable Speaker with another evidence, that industry can spring up and flourish, not only without legislative protection, but in defiance of its hostility.

What, sir, was American commerce, before this Government, with all its laws, was in existence?

We have upon record the authority of a celebrated man—of one who was an eloquent advocate of natural rights, till, startled by the spectre of the French revolution, he sought shelter under the shadow of the throne. We must all recollect the portrait of our ancestors by the masterly pencil of Mr. Burke. Struck with admiration at their enterprising labors, he exclaimed, "Whilst we follow them among tumbling mountains of ice, and see them penetrating the deepest frozen recesses of the North—whilst we are looking for them beneath the arctic circle—we hear that they have pierced into the opposite region of polar cold—that they are at the antipodes, and engaged under the frozen serpent of the South."

Such were our ancestors, before the Revolution—bold, hardy, and enterprising—distancing, as we are told, the "perseverance of Holland, the activity of France and the dexterous and firm sagacity of English enterprise." Was this the effect of legislative protection? No, sir; we are also told that the "colonies, in general, owed little or nothing to any care of Parliament—that they had not been squeezed into that happy form by the constraints of watchful and suspicious government; but that, through a wise and salutary neglect, a generous nature had been suffered to take her own way to perfection." But the colonies were not merely neglected—they were cramped and restricted by Parliament, by measures of a character similar to that proposed by the Committee on Manufactures.

The Revolution, for a time, turned the bold and enterprising spirit of our ancestors into a more glorious direction—from warring with the elements, they turned to grapple with oppression. But our wars once over—our colonial restrictions brushed away—our Union settled, as I trust, on eternal foundations—our mariners, free as the winds, were once more the heralds of older nations in desolate regions. All our restrictions and wars since have been unable to arrest the impetuous march of our commerce to that point of elevation and grandeur towards which a "generous nature" and an emancipated people irresistibly impelled it. Let us not dupe our understandings by attributing our commerce to a few harmless custom regulations.

The mariners of this country fear no competition. They ask no tax for their support. As to the bounty to our fishermen, whenever Government may deem it expedient to take off the duty upon salt, they may abolish the drawback. As to the discriminating duty, it is already practically abolished.

But gentlemen may consider all our navigation laws as protecting to our commerce. If they require only reciprocal justice, the measure is already more than full. The existing rates of duty operate as incidental encouragement to our manufactures, and are more than equal to any advantage commerce ever enjoyed.

But, continued Mr. C., I have now to consider the most important objections to the adoption of the principles advocated by the chairman of the Committee on Manufactures. How will they operate upon our revenue system?

There was a time, sir, when we supposed that in imposing duties on imports, our main object was revenue—a time when our manufacturers were satisfied with the incidental encouragement derived from our taxation. But the war unsettled many of our ancient and salutary rules. We are no longer to guard our Treasury. We established, in 1820, a Committee on Manufactures, which now calls upon us to abandon the principle of all former revisions of our tariff, and to impose duties for the purpose of prohibiting importations and extinguishing revenue. Before we abandon our old-fashioned revenue doctrine, let us inquire what effect the measure proposed will produce on our Treasury.

The object of the committee, as stated by the chairman, is to prohibit manufactures immediately, in most cases; ultimately, in others. It matters not whether the measure operates at once, or ten years hence. Whenever we cease to import the articles designed to be restricted or prohibited, we must inevitably cease to collect the revenue upon them. It may be, sir, that the anticipations of the committee will not be realized; that, notwithstanding these enormous duties, the urgent necessities of the country will still be supplied from abroad; but, in that case, the measure is useless—we augment our taxes without accomplishing the object in view. In arguing this question, however, we must presume that the purpose of the committee will be accomplished, and the articles prohibited. According to a statement which I have prepared, said Mr. C., from Treasury documents, it appears that manufactures designed to be protected by prohibitory duties, yielded, in the year ending 30th September last, a revenue of $7,327,256; that other articles, partially manufactured, or forming raw materials for manufactures, yielded, in the same year, $913,969, and that the agricultural articles yielded $278,736—making, altogether, $8,529,961 of revenue.

It is evident that, if the purposes of the committee be accomplished, a very considerable portion of this revenue must be extinguished. In any event, our revenue system will be seriously injured by the measure.

Are we in a condition to tamper with our revenue? The present crisis is a peculiar one in the history of our country. In our prospective speculations, we cannot be too sensible how much depends on the political events of a few months, whether we look at home or abroad. On these hang the question of peace or war—of diminished or increased expenditure. But, whether we have peace or war, we are not at liberty to tamper with our revenue. Let us suppose that, notwithstanding the present threatening appearances of war, we are destined to be saved from its heavy expenditures and calamities; that we are to be governed by the wise councils of a pacific Administration, consulting rather the happiness and best interests of our country than the gratification of a warlike or projecting ambition. Let us suppose that we are to realize fifteen years of peace, and (what would be a miracle in the history of government,) that we are to extinguish our public debt. Have gentlemen considered that, in that case, it would become our first duty to relieve the people from their taxes? If we believe that such will be the result, ought we not cautiously to avoid any augmentation of our imposts?—I trust that our expenditure may not be permitted to keep pace with our revenue, and that we may, in a few years, pay off a large portion of our public debt, and diminish our taxes.

But these are rather the speculations of hope, than the result of sober calculation, and should not be depended upon by statesmen. We have a striking instance of the error of such speculations. In February, 1792, Mr. Pitt congratulated the nation on its general prosperity; the state of the finances; the prospect of a long peace; and calculated upon a reduction of the public debt and expenditure. Little did that statesman anticipate, that, in February, 1793, the twenty-three years' war would commence—a war which shook the foundations of the Christian world. Little did he think, that, in thirty years, the expenditure would be augmented from sixteen to fifty millions sterling, and that the national debt would be trebled. All this, however, happened. And, may it not be fairly attributed in some measure, to an unnecessary interference with the affairs of other nations?

I trust, said Mr. C., our history may not furnish, in the next thirty years, a parallel case; but when I see gentlemen strenuously advocating measures extravagant and magnificent, and, at the same time, threatening to destroy our existing revenue system, I am not without apprehensions. Whence do we expect to draw our fifty millions for internal improvements, and our hundred millions for South American subsidies?

But, whether we embark in these schemes or not, our revenue ought not to be tampered with. It must be evident to all, that, without the accelerating touch of our Committee on Manufactures, the natural growth of our domestic industry must annually diminish our sources of revenue. Our existing revenue will probably, for many years to come, be sufficient to meet our expenditures, and to enable us gradually to extinguish our debt; but, we should recollect that our expenditure, (as it happens in every country,) advances with our revenue. It was less than two millions thirty years ago. That of the present year will exceed ten millions—in both cases excluding the interest on our public debt. During the last five years our income has very little exceeded our expenditure. We have now a surplus of $6,466,969, but there is due the Sinking Fund $11,921,604; our estimated revenue for the present year falls short of the receipts of the past near two millions of dollars, and the next year commences the payment of sixty-five millions of debt contracted during the war. I would again ask, whether this is a time to tamper with our revenue?

I am not disposed, said Mr. C., to excite idle alarms about our national debt, nor, should peace continue, do I doubt our ability to extinguish it, and, at the same time, to support, with judicious liberality and wise economy, our existing establishments; but, nevertheless, I cannot avoid a reference to the experience of England, when I reflect that our debt, which we had, in 1812, reduced to $45,000,000, has remained almost stationary for five years, and that it now amounts to about $96,000,000, including our Florida purchase. We should advert to that singular political fact, that the national debt of England has accumulated since 1689—it was then little more than £300,000. It is the office of wisdom to mark, on this political thermometer, the degrees by which taxation has rapidly mounted; and, at this early period in our history, at least to avoid any unnecessary experiments on our revenue. If we are, indeed, legislating for posterity, let us employ our existing revenue in extinguishing our debt, lest another war should add one or two hundred millions to it. Let us not lose an immediate and positive advantage in pursuing a remote speculation, liable at best to all the vicissitudes of the natural, moral, and political world.

But, if gentlemen are determined to execute this ingenious scheme for more rapidly extinguishing our existing revenue system, I trust they are prepared with a substitute of some kind. It would be well, in adopting the proposed measure, to throw a cautious and suspicious glance ahead, lest that licensed robber, the exciseman, should rush unexpectedly upon us; for, however acceptable his presence might be to some of us, upon conditions, I apprehend it would not be acceptable to the American people upon any conditions. The time may come when we may be compelled to resort to a system of internal taxation; when it arrives, I shall not shrink from my duty; but I have no desire to accelerate it. Our existing revenue system answers all our federal purposes—let us preserve it. Let us leave all our sources of internal taxation to the use of our State governments, whose necessities are annually increasing, and where they will be required for that very useful branch of expenditure, internal improvement.

The Tariff Bill.

I shall now, said Mr. C., notice the practical operation of the principles advocated by the chairman of the committee, upon property and right, as they are exhibited in the measure proposed. In considering the mere expediency of the measure, waiving the character of our Confederacy, I have presumed our internal to be as extensive as our external powers. I have met gentlemen on the broadest national ground, and clothed them with every attribute of sovereignty. But, in touching the points of property and right, we must claim the protection of our Federal Constitution. In applying the principles of our charter to this or any other measure, I shall not refine them into almost invisible webs, not strong enough to bind society together, nor shall I enlarge them to monstrous dimensions, crushing or annihilating every power with which they come in collision. I shall argue in the spirit of our Constitution, according to the maxim of that invincible advocate of colonial rights—the eloquent Chatham, who says, that “in questions of liberty and property, he was apt to distrust the refinements of learning;” he generally “consulted, and was determined by the dictates of common sense.” A guide more sure and penetrating, in such questions, than all the grave conclusions of profound and abstract science; one that cannot be deceived by our modern art of clothing an unconstitutional purpose in a Constitutional dress; that rejects the distinction between the abuse and usurpation of a power—a guide that can never be seduced by modern refinements or selfish patriotism. Common sense, that old and faithful friend of Constitutional liberty, inquires, What, with six or seven millions in the Treasury, are our taxes to be augmented? Is it for the purposes of government? No; they are to increase the profits of our manufacturers. Do they petition for these taxes? Some of them do; but a majority, entrenched within their citadels of power, are busily and usefully employed; they care not for our laws or our taxes; they have enough to do in managing their own concerns, and in regulating the affairs of the little worlds whose movements they superintend.

But, let us reject all these idle forms. Suppose our capitalists were to propose to contract with Government, giving bond and surety, binding themselves and their heirs to furnish this country, in ten years, and forever thereafter, with certain articles, at reduced prices, and in any quantity required, upon condition that Congress should forever prohibit the importation of similar articles. Is any gentleman prepared to advocate such a contract, upon federal and Constitutional ground? And yet, where, in common sense, is the essential difference between such a contract and the principles of the measure proposed—except, indeed, that by the bill we grant away the rights and property of the people, upon a mere speculation—without bond—without security? If these are the principles upon which the property of the consumers is to be legislated away, we shall always find capitalists ready to accept our contracts without responsibility.

But, let us again waive all forms. This modern scheme of protecting industry will cost our revenue at least two millions annually. Suppose our capitalists were to petition Congress for an appropriation of two millions, to be distributed annually among them, by our Committee on Manufactures, as bounties. Should we even dare to vote for such a disposition of the people's money? Yet, however startling this proposition may appear, what is the character of the measure actually proposed? While one-half of this bill is designed to prohibit importations, and plunder our Treasury, the other half is acknowledged to be an increase of our taxes, to supply the very deficiency thus about to be created. But, in case this increase of taxation should not be sufficient, we are then to resort to internal excise, to supply the wants of Government, thus doubly taxing the people of this country. Can such a measure be defended upon Constitutional ground?

But, how has this bill been framed? We must presume from its structure, from its minimums, its specific rates, and the dexterity of the third section, that the Committee on Manufactures have adopted, in every instance, the rates proposed by the manufacturers themselves; for its provisions are calculated to reach prohibition. We must presume (and that without intending any disrespect to the gentlemen) that the manufacturing members of this House, probably some fifty or sixty, have furnished to the committee the very rates which are specified in the bill; and thus has the bill been framed without consulting the interest of our Treasury, or the rights or welfare of any other interest. Indeed, if we are to judge by this formidable specimen of its labor, the committee must have framed this tax bill without regarding any interest but the one to which it is devoted.

Such, said Mr. C., is the practical operation of these our modern principles of legislation. If we are to adopt these principles—if we are to act upon this unequal plan of Government—we may expect to go on from age to age, receiving petitions for privileges, (for they are absolutely nothing else,) generally from one section of our country, where a large accumulation of moneyed capital is seeking new employments. We shall continue from session to session, granting our Legislative contracts, without responsibility, to our capitalists in one section, while the other sections, and that vast community of men without capital—the body of society in every country—must forever enjoy no other privilege but that of submitting quietly to the Government contracts, and contributing a portion of their annual income or labor, to increase the capitals of the contractors. And is this legislating in the spirit of our Federal Constitution? Are these the modern principles of Republican government? Is it not despotism? And yet, we have heard the exclamation, What! are we threatened with disunion?

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

I trust, said Mr. C., that the American people will ever be animated by the spirit of their ancestors. When they were threatened with measures similar to this now proposed—when they were shackled with restrictions—it appears our ancestors had other principles than those now in fashion—they thought it was patriotism to resist. When their property and rights were violated by lawless power, they made a determined stand for the liberties of mankind, and solemnly appealed to the Mighty Arbiter of nations—rejecting, with indignation, all parliamentary sophistries, they broke the chains with which subtle ingenuity and usurpation would have bound them.

When we see measures of this character advocated here upon principle; when we see such principles sanctioned by the names of some of the most distinguished men in our country; when we see gentlemen claiming a Constitutional right to impose on the agricultural and Atlantic States a system of perpetual vassalage, we must lament that, in our short history, we may read—a melancholy lesson for mankind—that even here, as elsewhere, it is not in these idle forms of constitutions, but in the statute book, we are to look for the character and principles of a Government. We may read that, under the name and sanction of a free constitution, private rights and private property may be violated with as much cool indifference as if this Government were armed with the proud authority of the lawless Ottoman. We may read in the zeal with which this measure is advocated an evident indication of the growth of power—we may foresee that even this, the sublimest institution of mankind, is destined to dissolution. We may even apprehend that this Government is destined to fall, like other human institutions, through its usurpations, and an abuse of its powers. The accumulation of power seems, under every form of government, to be inevitable. The people may occasionally rise in their majesty and dissolve these accumulations; our country may feel the salutary influence of such reactions; but power will ultimately triumph; these Alpine accumulations will ultimately bid defiance to the sun's meridian splendor; let us beware of the avalanche.

Our confederacy now rests on a rock of adamant—on our political morality—on an invincible attachment of an enlightened people to the best Constitution in the world. But, we must not fearlessly calculate on the immortality of our Union if we adopt measures like this; for no free Government can stand firm where it becomes a principle of legislation habitually, and without an imperative political necessity, to violate property and natural rights. No free people will ever submit to a Government which substitutes such rules for the essential principles of Constitutional liberty. Let us not, sir, retaining the forms of a free, act upon the principles of an absolute Government, and render it, through the tyranny of laws, detestable to any portion of this country.

The measure proposed by the committee can be supported on no ground. Our industry, in every branch, is probably destined to reach a premature perfection; while into the channel of manufactures the accumulations of trade and navigation are naturally and rapidly flowing. The general question is not the protection and encouragement of our domestic industry; it is absolutely nothing but a contest between a small portion of our large moneyed contractors, who solicit monopolies on the one hand, and a multitude of consumers, of all classes, on the other.

The bill reported by the Committee on Manufactures, and the system upon which it is founded, cannot be defended. They are both repugnant to the soundest principles of political economy; they consume our revenue, vitiate our legislation, and sap the foundations of our Union; while, in reference to the measure proposed, the state of the nation, whether we look at home or abroad, exhibits no political necessity to sustain it. Were the question limited to this solitary bill—whatever may be its character, whatever its fate—my fears would be in some degree diminished; but, viewing this measure as a part of a permanent system, I cannot look forward without apprehensions, lest, excited by our sectional jealousies and prejudices, we should be hereafter persuaded that the North has a distinct interest from the South—the East from the West—lest unrestricted power should, at some remote period, sacrifice the rights of the weaker portions of our common country. I trust, said Mr. C., the people on the Atlantic border may never be trampled upon because they are politically weak. We ask nothing but Constitutional justice—we ask only that commerce may not be perpetually cramped by laws, called for by neither policy nor honor. We entreat our political rulers to look to the future and inevitable destinies of this great commercial nation—to reflect upon the wars in which a high-spirited Republic, leading the van of Constitutional Governments, must be hereafter engaged; and we beg them to yield something more than a cold and suspicious attention to the humble rights of our mariners. I trust it will never be the policy of our Government to turn adrift, without chart or compass, our gallant tars, who, in the midnight of our calamities—when this Capitol was blazing with Vandal fires—avenged the insult—blotted out this spot upon our escutcheon, and waved our standard on the shores of England, fearlessly and triumphantly. I trust we shall never wage an angry and unnatural war against the heralds of our reputation abroad—nor drive from its fast moorings the vanguard of our defence.

Mr. G. MOORE, of Alabama, followed Mr. CAMBRELENG. Mr. M. commenced by saying that, notwithstanding this subject had occupied so much of the time of the House, and had called forth much talent and argument, yet, as the provision in the bill relating to the tax on cotton bagging, and which was proposed to be stricken out by the proposition which had been submitted by the honorable member from Louisiana, affected so materially the interest of the citizens of the State which he had the honor in part to represent, he trusted he would be indulged by the Committee, while he submitted a few remarks expressive of his disapprobation of this obnoxious section, and the reasons which influenced him in voting for striking it out.

Sir, said Mr. M., the general provisions of the bill, or the preliminary question whether a modified tariff, under existing circumstances, can be justified or not, are questions which I shall leave to be discussed by abler hands, and confine my arguments to the single item embraced in the provision for striking out.

It would be in vain for me, said Mr. M., at this time, to attempt to add any thing new to the able arguments which have been addressed to the Committee by honorable members who have preceded me, in favor of this proposition; but, sir, I will take the responsibility of attempting to show in what manner these arguments have been attempted to be refuted by the opposition.

Sir, when the Committee are informed that this "measure will operate excessively hard and oppressive upon the Southern section, that Kentucky and Ohio will probably not be able to supply the demand for the article, and if they were, that this measure will give them the monopoly in the sale of the article, at the sacrifice of the Southern interest, and at the same time by this means withdraw a respectable portion of the revenue from the public coffers," what are you told in reply, by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee who reported this bill? 1st, "That, true, this measure does press excessively hard, but you have no right to complain, because you have an equivalent in the sale of your cotton; that Pennsylvania consumes more cotton than all the cotton growing States; that there is a bounty of three cents per pound on cotton; that Kentucky and Ohio pay this three cents to the cotton growers, and ask, in return, this duty on cotton bagging."

Sir, the argument of the supposed three cents bounty on Southern cotton has been so completely met and refuted, by those who have preceded me, that nothing is left for me, even were I possessed of more ability than I can pretend to boast of. And, sir, how were these arguments attempted to be refuted by the honorable member from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee who reported this bill? By a resort to that substitute for argument, which is frequently made, when the doctrine attempted to be opposed is irresistible and unanswerable—I mean wit and ridicule.

Now, sir, as to the other position of the honorable member from Pennsylvania, "that Pennsylvania consumes more cotton than all the cotton growing States;" is this anywise extraordinary, and what does it prove? Need I tell the honorable member from Pennsylvania that the South is not, nor ever can be made, a manufacturing country; that it is inconsistent with the habits, customs, nay, sir, the interest of the people of this section of the Union; that they are purely agriculturists? And is this a good reason why their rights should be sacrificed? And here let me say, sir, I thank the honorable member from Virginia, who spoke yesterday on this occasion, for the very lucid view he took, in drawing the distinction between the situation of the greatest manufacturing country in the world (Great Britain) and our own; the reasons which influence their policy, which cannot ours; and for his unanswerable arguments showing that the West, in supporting this measure, abandon their true interest. Sir, how diametrically opposite is the object and effect of this measure, and a bill introduced by the honorable member from Virginia, over the way—I mean the bill providing for the occupying the mouth of Columbia river, which offers greater bounties and holds out greater inducements for emigration than have ever been known heretofore, and the tariff, offering the greatest bounties to the Northern and Eastern people not to emigrate.

But, Mr. Chairman, I will tell honorable members in the Opposition, that they may impose what tax they please upon the article which envelopes our cotton; trammel it as you can by the provisions of this oppressive bill; take from the Southern planter his privilege of going with his produce to what market he pleases, and say to him you shall not take in return such articles as are indispensable to your prosperity, and, in doing this, withdraw from the public coffers a considerable portion of the revenue which possibly must be supplied by a direct tax upon the people; when all this you have effected, to the oppression of one section of the Union and aggrandizement of the other, still, sir, I say this bill will not possess the magic power (inspired as the honorable gentleman from Kentucky would intimate it was) to change that order of things nature has ordained. The Southern people, after all these sacrifices, and violation of their rights, must still be agriculturists, and the cotton of the South will still cross the Atlantic.

Now, sir, I will endeavor to answer the remark of the honorable member from New York, who sits to my right, which was also assumed by the honorable Speaker, "that the tax imposed on cotton bagging was paid by the consumer." Sir, as a general rule, this may be true, but I deny that it can be applied to this particular case. You may apply this doctrine to broadcloth; the consumer pays it. Apply it to coarse woollens, to foreign spirits; the consumer pays it. But, sir, to apply it to the article under consideration, which is not an article of merchandise, in that interpretation—it is the article only in which that of merchandise is wrapped—its office is performed when the cotton has arrived at its destined market—it is then useless, and thrown away. Sir, the doctrine that the purchaser of cotton will increase the price in proportion to the price which the owner has been compelled to give for the article by which it is enveloped, I cannot subscribe to; and, sir, to contend for this principle, is to advocate a point in disinterestedness and benevolence to which it has not been designed that human nature shall attain. No, sir; you may take my word for it, the purchaser of cotton will be governed by motives and considerations which govern others on similar occasions, by a consideration in connexion with the cotton; and not with a view to the extravagant price which the bagging may have cost the owner, and which now is useless, and thrown away.

Now, sir, one word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, who sits immediately before me, and who, I am sorry to see, is not in his seat at present. Sir, as well as I can recollect, that gentleman informed the Committee that the people of the West had a right to demand this extraordinary tribute of two hundred and odd thousand dollars per annum, of the South, for the following consideration: "They purchase the cotton at twenty-five cents per pound, and furnish bagging of a superior quality, which, from its being weighty, they receive more in weight than the original cost." Now, sir, this position, to me, is so very extraordinary, that I must be permitted to say that I am an infidel to its faith. Sir, if the gentleman will prove its accuracy, I will acknowledge my error, and I will then acknowledge the correctness of another position taken by that gentleman, and which was assumed by the honorable Speaker, "that the Southern delegation, in their opposition to this bill, opposed the interest of their constituents." Now, sir, unpleasant as I considered this compliment as relates to myself, yet, if the gentleman from Kentucky will prove the accuracy of the other position, I will admit the truth of both. Will that gentleman inform the Committee whether there are not some two or three planters in the Southern country whose crop united will glut the market of Kentucky and Ohio? True may it be said, that the Southern delegation—yes, sir, and their constituents, too, are incapable of discovering their own interest, when they ship their cotton to New Orleans, New York, Liverpool, and France, for the prices at which it is quoted at present, when they can send to the honorable member's country and receive twenty-five cents. Sir, they would all be idiots, and need Western guardians.

Now, sir, as to the price, first, of cotton bagging—this article commands, at present, in the section of country which I have the honor to represent, thirty-three and a third cents, and sometimes more; perhaps this may be considered the average price. This is paid for it, sir, in good money, by which I do not mean specie, nor United States bills, but such as is current in the country, such as is receivable in ordinary transactions, and such as will purchase our cotton. Now, sir, will the honorable member from Kentucky take the responsibility of stating that cotton will command twenty-five cents, in this kind of money, in his country? I presume he will not. If it is not in money, what is it in, Mr. Chairman? Not in chips and whetstones, (if I may be allowed the expression in this Hall,) but in old paper rags and trash—such combustibles as the Legislature of the honorable member's State, by a legislative enactment, have consigned a great proportion of, to a bonfire. Then, sir, away with the argument that our cotton finds such a liberal market in that quarter.

The gentleman from Kentucky urged the propriety of this obnoxious provision, by which the Southern country is to be made to pay this extraordinary tribute for cotton bagging, to the West, upon another ground. He said "that, not only 'did his countrymen supply the South with the 'article, but they pursued it, after the cotton 'bales were formed, to New Orleans, and occupied stations behind it.'" Sir, all are willing to acknowledge the patriotism and bravery of the hardy sons of the West; and, I assure that gentleman, that bills of patriotism, properly drawn upon my gratitude, will never be protested, but promptly honored. And, sir, that there have been gathered, on the plains of New Orleans, military laurels which now decorate the American brow, and a character for military skill and patriotism, obtained on that memorable occasion, for the people of this Republic, which I, as one citizen of the Union, shall never cease to rejoice in contemplating, is also true, and will be denied by none. But, sir, all I ask, in reference to this subject, is, that the gentleman will give to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's.

Mr. Chairman, it has been triumphantly asked by the honorable Speaker, "Will you submit to 'the Scotch manufacturer, or will you create an 'American competitor, who will rival him?" No, sir, this is delusive. I will state the real question connected with this subject. Sir, it is truly and emphatically this—Will you suffer the duty on this article to remain as it is at present, whereby there exists a fair competition between the American and European manufacturer, derive a considerable annual revenue from its importation, furnish employment for your navy? or will you substitute this prohibitory duty; exclude the foreign imported article, and with it this item of your revenue, which I believe is admitted on all hands to be very acceptable, and which the honorable member from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, admits will be the consequence, but which the honorable Speaker, more on his guard, did not do, knowing this admission would take from the measure one of the principal grounds upon which its plausibility could be supported? Now, this is the true state of the case. And what is the consequence? You create a monopoly in the sale of this article for the benefit of the West, and at the sacrifice of the South.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard upon this occasion a strain of eloquence and oratory with reference to patriotism and the necessity of the American people being free from European dependence, &c., which, sir, is seldom witnessed in this or any other country. But, I confess, sir, I did not think it was applied to the able arguments which have been urged against the bill, or this provision. Many liberal professions have also been made of a disposition to do equal justice to every part of the Union. But, sir, I hope on this occasion honorable members will give us example with precept.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Sir, the citizens who reside in that part of the State which I have the honor to represent, have already had an awful example of Western liberality, when they possess power. Sir, the time which intervened during the late war was one during which we were entirely dependent. At that time the article could not be imported. They then had the protection which is now sought by this provision. And what were the consequences? The article was scarce, and cost two prices, and even at that could not be procured plentifully.

Sir, I have not forgotten one occasion wherein the Western delegation looked to the South with solicitude (and not in vain) for aid in support of a measure which they viewed as one of the last importance to their constituents—I mean the Cumberland road. No, sir; I believe “Cumberland” was thought inapplicable in the title, and on motion was stricken out, and “Public” inserted; and some gentlemen thought “Western” was still more appropos. Sir, I presume the section of country which I have the honor to represent, is as adjacent to this great highway as any other portion of the cotton-growing country—and perhaps the nearest point is three hundred miles distant—and I venture to say, a bale of cotton will never be found on this road going to market. Now, sir, we ask an interchange of reciprocity in good feeling and good offices.

But, sir, in order to test the declaration of liberality which has been avowed on this floor, that this bill provides equal justice and protection to every part of this Union, let us examine the items of taxation, and see what portion will be found applicable to Southern protection, and begin with broadcloth. Gentlemen will not contend but this operates as much, or more, to the prejudice of the South as to any other quarter. Take coarse woollens. This, sir, is still more severe and oppressive; this, it is well known, the Southern country must have, with which to clothe their servants. Wool is also an article they cannot raise. And, sir, more oppressive still is the tax on iron—an article more indispensable to the planters’ prosperity, and which the South do not, and perhaps never can, manufacture—not to mention many others, such as foreign spirits, silks, &c. These, although they operate as a tax upon the Southern interest more than any other quarter, are articles more of luxury, and not so indispensable to the prosperity of the agricultural profession. Now, sir, I sincerely hope honorable members will pause, and yet do the Southern section of this Union justice—it is all we ask.

When Mr. MOORE had concluded—

Mr. STORRS, of New York, followed, in opposition to the pending motion, and, generally, in reply to Mr. CAMBRELENG—when, on motion of Mr. MARTINDALE, of New York, the Committee rose; and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 19.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill for the relief of John S. Moffet; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the trustees in behalf of the United Society, commonly called Shakers, residing at West Union, in Indiana; which was laid on the table.

The Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred, on the 26th of January ultimo, a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the said District, in relation to a system of government for said District, were discharged from so much of said memorial as suggests certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States, and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; also, from the memorial adopted at a meeting of the Society of Friends, held at New Garden, in North Carolina, in November, 1823, and the said memorial was laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of vesting in the trustees who have been, or may hereafter be, appointed, by the inhabitants of the “Illinois Grant,” in the State of Indiana, the fee simple of certain lands appropriated by Congress for the support of schools in said grant, for the sole use for which said lands were originally granted, and conformable to the provisions of an act of the General Assembly of said State.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. OWEN offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to examine and report to this House what will be the effect upon the revenue of the Government of the United States if the bill now before this House entitled “A bill to amend the several acts imposing duties upon imports,” should pass into a law—and if its operation would, in their opinion, diminish the revenue to an extent greater than the expenditures of Government will admit of, what course it will be expedient to pursue to supply that deficiency.

Mr. OWEN addressed the Chair to the following effect:

The resolution which I have submitted to the consideration of the House, embraces considerations of the deepest importance. An additional interest is given to it, on account of its being a departure, in some degree, from the ordinary course of proceeding in Parliamentary bodies; and to this point permit me to ask the particular attention of the House, for it is not my wish to make innovations upon ancient usage, or to violate established rule. I should, therefore, be pleased to learn the opinions of honorable gentlemen, who have more experience in legislation than I have, upon this point. But, to me, from my limited experience, from all the sources of information upon such subjects, which have been within my reach, I have concluded, that, though there was to be found no precedent in our legislative proceeding, that yet it is strictly parliamentary, and to this authority only which we could look, I am supported—I mean the proceedings in the British Parliament. And to this point the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who addressed the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, a few days ago, made so correctly this reference, that it is useless to repeat it. I take it for granted, then, that this proposition is fairly before the House; and, indeed, if it were not, its importance to the dearest interests of this country would call upon the House to exercise the great power with which it is vested, in the universal control of its own proceedings, when the public good demands it.

I will proceed, then, to the consideration of the resolution; though I would here remark that it is not my wish, and I hope gentlemen will not so understand me, to suspend the discussion of the bill alluded to in the resolution, until the report of the committee can be obtained; but, to let it proceed, as if no such resolution had passed. And, before we are called upon finally to act, the information wished for, would, without doubt, be furnished.

There are two distinct propositions contained in the resolution. The first is, to ascertain the effect that the adoption of the proposed tariff will have upon the revenue of the Government—the second, if that effect causes a deficiency in the revenue, in what manner that deficiency is to be supplied.

Many have been the estimates and calculations already submitted to this House, with regard to this effect, all of which go to show that a deficiency in the revenue must necessarily follow the adoption of the tariff, with its present provisions; but, to what extent, there is difference in opinion; that this may be reconciled, and the estimates furnished may be official, I would hope that the House would sustain my proposition. Let it then be conceded (as I believe the most devoted friends of the tariff are willing to do) that the revenue will be diminished to an extent greater than our expenditures will admit of. When is the proper time to take steps to supply the deficiency? My own opinion is, this should go hand in hand; that, with the commencement of the disease should begin the application of the remedy. But, before I proceed further upon this point, I would remark, that the mode I have adopted to attain my object, is the correct one. That the information asked for, is desirable, indeed absolutely necessary, all admit. Through your committees, then, sir, should this information come; the very organization of our body, its distribution of business among our committees, established usage, have prescribed the mode of obtaining information useful and necessary, upon any subject of deliberation, to be through the appropriate committees; this will be admitted. But perhaps I may be told that the committee mentioned in the resolution is not the proper one; that if there was to be a deficiency in our revenue, caused by the act of one committee, that same committee should devise means to supply it; that the committee that pulled down should also build up. From this opinion, should it be entertained, I must dissent; over public revenue and public expenditure, the Committee of Ways and Means have exclusive jurisdiction; from that committee, alone, then, can any information upon these points come officially, and in this shape we ought to have it.

But, to return to the main object of the resolution—the probable deficiency in our revenue—I did say that it would be conceded that this was inevitable. But, if it is not, I would beg leave to remark, that the subjects toward which the provisions of the tariff are mainly directed, are, also, the most important sources of our present revenue. Against woollens, cottons, linens, hardware, glass, and foreign distilled spirits, are the provisions of the tariff directed; and, some think, even to a prohibition. If this should be the case—as from these our revenue principally arises—there is no member of this House who can, for a moment, hesitate upon the propriety of pursuing the course pointed out in the resolution. We must, therefore, conclude that the passage of the tariff, in its present shape, must be destructive to the revenue. And I am well convinced that no individual is prepared to say that this would not bring upon our governmental operations much embarrassment and retard its regular progress. This is a state of things that we all must be anxiously desirous never to bear witness to. Lest, then, we should be compelled to do so, and that by our own acts, let us inquire what there is to be done—and this brings me to the second proposition contained in my resolution. If there is a deficiency, in what manner is it to be supplied? Here, perhaps, in the outset, I may be told, “that sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.” But, with due deference to the opinions of all others, for my own part, I should think that it was the true and sound policy of all Governments, that when evil is anticipated, to prepare to meet it by provident provisions; and not to await its injury—lest, to recover from it, might require redoubled energy. What then, is to be done? This is the fit time to make the inquiry.

I am told by honorable gentlemen, that the advancement of the manufacturing interests is of such vital importance, that though we should be driven to excise and direct taxation, that this policy would be willingly adopted; for my own part, I do think that, before this policy is resorted to, the situation of the country should be properly understood; and, from the principles of our Government, this should be the last, the ultimate resort; extreme cases alone can justify it. The State that I represent is unprepared to endure this policy. We are already heavily burdened, the States generally are embarrassed; I shall then most solemnly protest against this resort. Other gentlemen are prepared, perhaps, to say that a “public debt is a public blessing;” and, to obtain this, we will destroy the revenue, and effect a loan to meet public expenditures. From this policy I must also be permitted to dissent. I hope, therefore, a majority of this House will view this subject in the same light that I do, and sustain me in the proposition; at all events, no evil can result from the adoption of the resolution; and indeed I wish the information in this official manner, that the people of the country may know what is to be the immediate effect of this tariff, if made a law, upon their interests. I hope the resolution will be adopted.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. TOD opposed the resolution, conceiving it (until set right by an explanation from Mr. OWEN) to be a measure intended for delaying the discussion of the bill. Procrastination had last session been successfully resorted to to defeat the bill; and the manufacturers, in consequence of the unsuccessful agitation of the tariff question in this House, had sustained a loss of two millions of dollars; because the foreign merchants and manufacturers conceiving it as a thing of course that such a bill, if once proposed, could not be rejected, had poured in their goods in great quantities, in anticipation of its passage. He trusted gentlemen would not attempt the same policy again. The bill would have to be passed upon sooner or later. If put off now, it would certainly come up next year; and if put off then, it would recur the year following; and would gentlemen thus waste the time and money of their constituents? Could not the gentleman from Alabama vote till he had learned the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means? The bill, at all events, could do no fatal injury to the revenue in one or two years; that a previous plan was indispensable to meet its effects.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, (chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means) had no objection to the gentleman's obtaining the information sought by his resolution; but objected to the mode proposed. The chairman of the Committee of Manufactures was the proper organ through whom to obtain it. That committee were in possession of all the facts on the subject; the operation of the bill must, of course, have long been before them; and if the Committee of Ways and Means were applied to, they would only have to go to the Committee of Manufactures to get what they might report to the House. The bill was not for revenue, but for protection; it therefore appertained wholly to the other committee. But, if the gentleman wished a counteracting system prepared, to meet the operation of the tariff bill, he was premature. If the Committee of Ways and Means should now propose a plan, it must be founded on the bill as it at present stands; but, by the time that report should be prepared, the bill might be entirely changed, and a new report must be prepared. When the bill had undergone all its modifications, and had passed the House, if its operation was to be injurious to the revenue, the Committee of Ways and Means would, of course, find it their duty to provide a plan of remedy. But, having, last session, given the subject a careful and deliberate examination, he was decidedly of opinion that a tariff might be adopted, which, while it gave every proper protection to manufactures, instead of diminishing, would augment the revenue. He would not go so far as to say that the present bill needed no alteration in any of its details; but he was satisfied the two objects were perfectly compatible. He referred, in support of this position, to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, last year laid before Congress, (a part of which he read,) and observed, in conclusion, that the Committee of Ways and Means were prepared to perform their duty, when the proper occasion required it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON considered the information sought for in the resolution indispensable to an intelligent vote on the bill before the House. Some gentlemen believed the revenue would be seriously affected, if not destroyed by its operation. He wished some certain information whether this was likely to be the fact, and if it was about to take away one-half, or one-third, or any other large portion of the revenue, he wished to see beforehand how this was to be made up. He did expect that the honorable chairman of the Committee of Manufactures would have laid some detailed and authentic statement on this subject before the House; he had waited for it, but in vain. He did not care from what committee it was obtained, but thought that, as it was a question which touched the revenue, the Committee of Ways and Means would be the proper committee to present it to the House; and he quoted the standing rules of the House to show the duties of that committee. He wished to see a formal report, that he might have something to show to his constituents, and quiet their apprehensions, and if it could not be prepared in a week, he would wait ten days, or even a fortnight, to obtain it. He hoped the House would not, by the force of a majority, pass any law in such a manner as would put it in the power of a minority to say they forced this measure upon us without giving us the requisite information respecting it.

Mr. BUCHANAN thought this a most extraordinary resolution. After the bill had been almost a month under discussion, when the measure had been examined by every newspaper in the country for years past, and the whole nation had taken sides on the question, that Congress should formally ask for information as to what would be the operation of the bill! He thought gentlemen were competent to obtain this information for themselves, or why were they sent here? The gentleman from Louisiana had, now come fairly out, and avowed his willingness for delay; but it was delay that ruined the bill last session, and delay would destroy it now. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means had expressed his opinion—the members of that committee were all in the House: Why send them out to make a long report, and then occupy as much time afterwards as before it? It was unreasonable to find fault with the chairman of the Committee of Manufactures, for not laying a general statement before the House; he had not been called on to do so—the debate having thus far been almost confined to cotton bagging. When necessary, he doubted not that gentleman was fully prepared to show what would be the operation of the whole bill, and of all its parts.

Mr. BRENT thought the opposition to the resolution was yet more extraordinary than the resolution could be. It was accused of being a mere scheme for delay; but the gentleman from Alabama had expressly disavowed any intention of suspending the debate. Some honorable gentlemen from Kentucky had said that if the bill was going to lead to an excise, they should oppose it. Surely we wanted information on that point.

Here the debate was arrested by the Speaker, who proclaimed the order of the day.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, all the previous orders of the day were suspended, and the House went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, in the Chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824. The bill was considered as reported in blank; and the first blank, which is for the pay of the Army, and subsistence of officers, including the pay and subsistence of the officers and cadets belonging to the Military Academy, at West Point, was filled with $994,307 05.

The second blank, for subsistence, was filled with $269,847.

The third blank, for forage for officers, was filled with $39,126.

The fourth blank, for the recruiting service, was filled with $13,400.

The fifth blank, for contingent expenses for the recruiting service, was filled with $15,800.

The sixth blank, for the Purchasing Department, was filled with $141,127 59.

In answer to a query of Mr. TRIMBLE, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (Mr. McLANE) replied, that in the purchases for the clothing of the troops, a preference was always given to American manufactures, (unless where the public interest would materially suffer.)

Mr. TRIMBLE thought this rule ought universally to prevail. As we were soon to be called on to attend the funeral of our little Army, he wished to know whether its shroud was to be made of American manufacture or foreign.

Mr. McLANE said that many of our woollen manufactures were sustained almost entirely by purchases from the War Department.

The seventh blank, for the purchase of woollens, during the year 1824, in advance for the year 1825, was filled with $20,000.

Mr. COBB made some inquiries respecting this item, and Mr. FLOYD moved to strike it out; but its propriety was explained and defended by Mr. McLANE, and the motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The eighth blank, for the Medical and Hospital Department, was filled with $10,000.

Mr. COCKE moved to strike it out. Mr. WHIPPLE replied and advocated its necessity; and the motion was lost.

The ninth blank, for the Quartermaster General's Department, was filled with $249,000.

The tenth blank, for the Military Academy, including hospital for cadets and troops, two wings to be added to the Academy, for the departments of philosophy and chemistry; a double stone house, for accommodation of two families of professors; a laboratory and green-house, out houses for superintendent's quarters; office for the professor of engineering; cast iron pipes for supplying water; a modeller, and a plate for a diploma for graduates, was filled with $33,400.

For the purchase of Gridley's farm, $10,000.

On this sum, and especially on a component item, of ten thousand dollars, for the purchase of a farm adjoining the Academy, a desultory debate arose, which occupied the House till after four o'clock. The propriety of the purchase was advocated by Messrs. CRAIG, WARFIELD, POINSETT, STRONG, McLANE, SHARPE, ARCHER, WOOD, MERCER, HAMILTON, and McDUFFIE—and opposed by Messrs. COBB, BUCK, COCKE, SANFORD, McCox, and FLOYD. Mr. COCKE proposed an amendment, making the appropriation for the purchase conditional: 1st, that no more than $10,000 should be given for the land; and, 2d, that the consent of the State of New York should be given to the sale. The former condition prevailed, but the latter, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, was stricken out; and the whole clause, as amended, was carried—ayes 107.

In support of this measure, it appeared that a part of the small isolated spot on which the Academy stands, (surrounded on one side by a deep river, and on the other by steep and almost inaccessible mountains,) is occupied by a farm, owned by a Mr. Gridley, on which there stands a tavern, but a few hundred yards from the Academy. Every effort to remove so great a nuisance, or to bring it under any effectual restraint, had proved unavailing; and its effect, in counteracting the salutary discipline of the establishment, had long been a source of painful regret to the superintending officers. As the only efficient remedy, it was proposed to buy the land for the United States, and attach it to the Academy; to which a farther inducement operated, as it would afford a favorable site for a hospital and other out-buildings. The measure was opposed, as unnecessary, and as insufficient for the end proposed. Unnecessary, because the cadets were supposed to be in no danger from so low and degrading a temptation as a tavern could afford; if any of them were disposed to become sots, they ought at once to be expelled from the Institution. And, besides, the discipline of the establishment ought to be sufficient to restrain immorality among the students. Insufficient, because if the whole farm was purchased, a tavern would be erected a little further off, and the danger as great as ever. Besides, there was a daily communication with Newburg and New Windsor, and also occasionally with New York; and young men disposed to dissipation could not be checked by putting the means of gratification at a little greater distance. Other establishments of the same kind, in the South and in the West, were situated in the midst of cities or populous towns, and yet were in a good condition.

To this it was replied, that the officers on the spot were the best judges of the case, and they were deeply impressed with the indispensable necessity of having that tavern put down. They had endeavored to effect its suppression by the authority of the State Legislature of New York, and some bill on that subject was now before that body. Distance was certainly a most important circumstance in measuring the strength of any temptation on the minds of the young. But the land at West Point was so situated, that if this little farm was held by the United States, there was no spot for miles round on which a tavern could possibly be erected. An affecting appeal was made by Mr. MERCER, in behalf of parental anxiety, and on youthful accessibility to the approaches of temptation; the warmest encomiums were pronounced upon the state of discipline and the system of instruction in the Academy, its order, regularity, and exact police. Mr. POINSETT had visited the European Military Schools, and pronounced this to be equal to any of them, if not superior. Mr. ARCHER testified with enthusiasm to the same point, and wished that the Secretary of War, in selecting from Congress a Visiting Committee to examine the Institution, would always compose it of its most decided enemies: they needed only one visit to convert them into its warmest advocates.

Mr. WOOD valued it as the best substitute for a standing army, by supplying, annually, a quota of accomplished military men, capable of organizing the militia of the country, and giving immediate efficiency to our Constitutional defence.

Mr. FOOT was a friend to the Institution and to the measure now proposed; but had an objection to its introduction into an appropriation bill.

Mr. LIVERMORE was also a friend to the Academy, but feared the insisting on this purchase might increase the objections of its opponents; and he disliked this indirect sort of legislation. If the farm was wanted, pass an act appropriating a sum for its purchase.

Some little pleasantry occurred in the debate, in consequence of a remark of Mr. WARFIELD, that he spoke in favor of the school from no personal or parental feelings, as, he thanked Heaven, he still enjoyed a state of single blessedness. Mr. FLOYD, in reply, observed, that he was happy to observe the gentleman was very thankful even for the smallest blessing. Mr. BUCK founded his opposition to the measure, from personal observation, having been for years a student at West Point. With this exception, every gentleman who had visited this Institution, warmly advocated the appropriation.

Having proceeded thus far in the bill, the Committee rose, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, February 20.

Mr. ARCHER, by leave of the House, presented a memorial of the inhabitants of the town of Petersburg, in the State of Virginia, in opposition to such a revision of the tariff of duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, upon their importation into the United States, as is proposed in the bill now pending before this House, to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.—Referred.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by the statements of the affairs of the Bank of the United States, called for by the resolution adopted on the motion of Mr. STORRS, on the 17th instant; read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. SLOANE, from the Committee of Elections, to which was referred the memorial of sundry citizens of the Congressional district of Norfolk, in the State of Massachusetts, complaining of the election and return of JOHN BAILEY, as a member of this House from said district, presented a report, concluding with a resolution "that Mr. BAILEY is not entitled to a seat in this House;" which report was laid on the table. The report is as follows:

The Committee of Elections, to which was referred the petition of sundry citizens and inhabitants of the district of Norfolk, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, praying, for the reasons therein set forth, that John Bailey, the member returned from said district to the present Congress, may not be admitted to a seat in this House, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

The petitioners found their objections to the right of Mr. Bailey to a seat in this House, on the alleged fact that he is ineligible, not being possessed of those qualifications which, by the Constitution of the United States, are indispensable to the holding of a seat in Congress, "because, at the time the election was held, at which the said Bailey was supposed to have been chosen, he was not an inhabitant of Massachusetts, but then was, and for many years before had been, and still is, an inhabitant of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. In pursuance of the authority vested in the committee by the resolution of the House, they have procured a statement from the Hon. John Q. Adams, Secretary of State, and they have obtained the affidavit of Charles Bulfinch, Esq., of the city of Washington. The Secretary states that Mr. Bailey was appointed by him a clerk in the Department of State, on the first day of October, 1817, at which time he was a resident of Massachusetts, and that he immediately repaired to Washington, and entered on the duties of his appointment, and that he has continued to reside in this city from that time, in the capacity of a clerk in the Department of State, until the 21st day of October, 1823, at which time he resigned the appointment. He further states that he has never known Mr. Bailey to exercise any of the rights of citizenship within the District, but always understood him as considering Massachusetts as his home, and his residence here as only temporary; and that he had considered Mr. Bailey as eligible, &c. Charles Bulfinch, Esq., testifies that he has known Mr. Bailey in this city since January, 1818; that he has resided in a public hotel, with occasional absences on visits to Massachusetts, until his marriage in this city, which took place about a year since, at which time he took his residence in the family of his wife's mother, where he still remains; that he knows of no instance of his exercising any of the rights of citizenship in this District. It appears that the election at which Mr. Bailey was chosen was held on the 8th day of September, 1823, at which time he was actually residing in this city in the capacity of a clerk in the State Department. The second section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States provides "that no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen."

The subject referred to the committee, they have viewed as one of great national consequence, and they have entered upon the consideration of it with a diffidence corresponding with its importance. The difficulty attending the interpretation of Constitutional provisions, which depend on the construction of a particular word, renders it necessary to a complete explanation, to obtain, if possible, a knowledge of the reasons which influenced the framers of the Constitution in the adoption and use of the word "inhabitant," and to make an endeavor at ascertaining, as far as practicable, whether they intended it to apply, according to its common acceptation, to the persons whose abode, living, ordinary habitation, or home, should be within the State in which they should be chosen, or, on the contrary, according to some uncommon or technical meaning. In what sense this word was intended to apply, can only be determined by reference to the Constitution itself; but some light may, perhaps, be thrown on the subject, by consulting the history of the times in which that Constitution was formed. It is well known that, at that time, much difference of opinion existed throughout the Union as to what form of Government would be best suited to the situation of the country; and that the difficulties which the Convention had to encounter, in adjusting the powers that were to be conferred on the General Government, and those which were to be reserved to the States, were of no ordinary kind. That body was, for a long time, divided into three different parties, unequal in numbers, but alike zealous in support of their favorite theories; one was for a Government of a consolidated form, in which the State governments would scarcely have sustained their existence; another was for a system of the Federal complexion, differing but little from the original compact, under the Articles of Confederation; and a third was in favor of a Government partaking both of the national and federative principle. Those who were in favor of retaining to the States the greatest portion of their sovereignty, were extremely assiduous and persevering, and it was with much reluctance that they finally agreed to unite in that spirit of mutual concession and compromise, out of which resulted the adoption of the present Constitution. This class of politicians had imbibed the opinion that almost any features of a national character, which should be incorporated into the Constitution, would, in the progress of the Government, absorb the most essential powers of the States, and render them little more than subordinate corporations; and it was, no doubt, owing to their exertions that many of those provisions were inserted in the Constitution, which go to sustain the distinctive character of the several States as component parts of the General Government, and which were intended as effectual checks to its progressive influence. Of this nature is the provision that the States shall be equally represented in the Senate; that the votes in the House of Representatives, in deciding the election of President of the United States, shall be by States, each State having one vote; and that none but the inhabitants of the respective States should represent them in either House of Congress. It was supposed that, unless a provision was made by which State distinctions and State feelings were to be preserved, there would be danger of a people who had so much intercourse with each other losing their attachment for the State governments, and thereby add to the powers of the General Government, which many thought, in its origin, alarming in their extent. In connexion with this, there was still another view of this subject, which in all probability had its influence with the framers of the Constitution, and induced them to confine the people to the election of Senators and Representatives from among the inhabitants of their respective States. They could not but anticipate that, in the progress of time, the General Government would necessarily concentrate, at the Seat of that Government, a number of persons who would be engaged in the different branches of its Administration, and whose long habit of dependence on those who might fill the chief places in the Government, would do much towards enlisting them in support of almost any cause which the Administration might wish to promote. Every person acquainted with human nature must be fully satisfied of the bias which long continuance in particular situations and associations is likely to produce on the mind; and statesmen, so well versed in political history as were the members of the Federal Convention in forming a Constitution of Government, could not exclude from their minds the course of policy pursued by the British Government in this respect. It was well known to them that, by means of the election of favorites to the House of Commons, through the direct influence of the Government, the Ministry were enabled to govern that country in contempt of the public will, thereby rendering representation a mere form. The true theory of representative Government is bottomed on the principle that public opinion is to direct the legislation of the country, subject to the provisions of the Constitution, and the most effectual means of securing a due regard to the public interest, and a proper solicitude to relieve the public inconveniences, is, to have the Representative selected from the bosom of that society which is composed of his constituents. A knowledge of the character of a people for whom one is called to act, is truly necessary, as well as of the views which they entertain of public affairs. This can only be acquired by mingling in their company and joining in their conversations; but, above, all, that reciprocity of feeling and identity of interest, so necessary to relations of this kind, and which operate as a mutual guarantee between the parties, can only exist, in their full extent, among members of the same community. All these reasons conspire to render it absolutely necessary that every well regulated Government should have, in its Constitution, a provision which should embrace those advantages; and there can be no doubt it was from considerations of this kind that convention wisely determined to insert in the Constitution that provision which declares no person shall be a member of either House of Congress, "who shall not, at the time of the election, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen," meaning, thereby, that they should be bona fide members of the State, subject to all the requisitions of its laws, and entitled to all the privileges and advantages which they confer. That this subject occupied the particular attention of the convention, and that the word inhabitant was not introduced without due consideration and discussion, is evident from the journals, by which it appears that, in the draught of a constitution reported by the committee of five, on the 6th of August, the word resident was contained, and that, on the 8th of the same month, the convention amended that report, by striking out "resident," and inserting "inhabitant," as a stronger term, intended more clearly to express their intention that the persons to be elected should be completely identified with the State in which they were to be chosen. Having examined the case, in connexion with the probable reasons which influenced the minds of the members of the convention, and led to the use of the word inhabitant in the Constitution, in relation to Senators and Representatives in Congress, it may not be improper, before an attempt is made at a further definition of the word, a little to consider that of citizen, with the view of showing that many of the misconceptions in respect to the former, have arisen from confounding it with the latter. The word inhabitant comprehends a simple fact, locality of existence; that of citizen a combination of civil privileges, some of which may be enjoyed in any of the States in the Union. The word citizen may properly be construed to mean a member of a political society; and although he might be absent for years, and cease to be an inhabitant of its territory, his rights of citizenship may not be thereby forfeited, but may be resumed whenever he may choose to return; or, indeed, such of them as are not interdicted by the requisition of inhabitaney, may be considered as reserved; as, for instance, in many of the States a person who, by reason of absence, would not be eligible to a seat in the Legislature, might be appointed a judge of any of their courts. The reason of this is obvious. The judges are clothed with no discretionary powers about which the public opinion is necessary to be consulted; they are not makers, but expounders of the law, and the constitution and statutes of the State are the only authorities they have to consult and obey.

It is not within the knowledge of the committee, that any of the States have Constitutional or legal provisions on the subject of expatriation, unless, indeed, the laws in relation to the settlement of paupers should be considered of that description; we are, therefore, left without any certain rule by which to determine what length of absence shall amount to a forfeiture of citizenship. Perhaps, the only safe criterion by which to determine the matter, would be to consider every person who removes from one part of the United States and settles in another, as ceasing to be a citizen of the State from which he has removed, whenever, by the constitution or laws of the place where he has taken up his residence, he is entitled to exercise the rights of a citizen there. From what has already been said, it must appear that the words citizen and inhabitant cannot be considered as synonymous; but it may not be improper to quote some authority in support of this opinion. The difference of situation between the people of the United States and that of the people of Europe, in a political point of view, renders it difficult to find in the writings on either national or municipal law, in that country, any thing exactly in point; all, however, agree in considering inhabitant as connected with habitation and abode. Thus, Vattel says, (in book 1, chap. 19, sec. 213.) "The inhabitants, as distinguished from citizens, are strangers, who are permitted to settle and stay in the country. Bound by their residence to the society, they are subject to the laws of the State while they reside there; and they are bound to defend it while it grants them protection, though they do not participate in all the rights of citizens." If, according to the doctrine here laid down, the mere settlement and stay in a country where the laws precluded those who thus settled from becoming members of the civil society, gives the character of inhabitants to such persons, it clearly establishes the distinction between citizen and inhabitant, and shows that the latter appellation is derived from habitation and abode, and not from the political privileges they are entitled to exercise. Jacob's law dictionary defines "inhabitant" to be "a dweller or householder in any place, as inhabitants of the ville are householders in the ville. The word inhabitants includes tenants in fee simple, tenants for life, &c., tenants at will, and he who has no interest but only his habitation and dwelling." But should these authorities not be considered conclusive as to the definition of the word inhabitant, let the constitutions of the several States be examined, and see if, in some of them, the word has not received a construction exactly similar to what is here contended for. The constitution of New Hampshire contains the following declaration: "And every person qualified as this constitution provides, shall be considered an inhabitant, for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or place within this State, in the town, parish, and plantation where he dwelleth or hath his home." The constitution of Massachusetts declares that, "to remove all doubts concerning the word inhabitant, in this constitution, every person shall be considered an inhabitant (for the purpose of electing and being elected into any office or place within this State) in that town, district, or plantation, where he dwelleth or hath his home." The constitution of New Hampshire was adopted in 1792, and that of Massachusetts in 1780; the former five years after, and the latter seven years before the formation of the Constitution of the United States; and the word inhabitant is used in these constitutions in the same relation to the members of the State Legislature, that it is in the Constitution of the United States to members of Congress. These constitutions were formed by conventions, in which were many of the most learned and practical statesmen of that day; and the declarations which they contain of the manner in which they intended the word inhabitant should be understood, ought to be considered as settling, conclusively, its true and legitimate meaning. Nearly all the State constitutions require either inhabitaney or residence as one of the qualifications of Representatives in the Legislature; and in those of Delaware, Georgia, and Ohio, a saving clause is inserted in favor of such as may be absent on the public business of the State, or of the United States, thus clearly indicating the opinion that absence from the State divests the person of the character of inhabitant. The act of Congress of the 1st of March, 1790, entitled "An act providing for the enumeration of the inhabitants of the United States," affords another evidence of the same construction of the word inhabitant: the act provides "that the marshals of the several districts of the United States shall be, and they are hereby, authorized to cause the number of the inhabitants within their respective districts to be taken," &c., and by the same act, the marshal is required to make oath that he will cause to be made a perfect enumeration and description of all persons resident within his district, &c. By which it appears that, in the opinion of Congress, at that time, the inhabitants of the respective districts were the persons residing or living therein. The same principle is also recognised in the act of Congress "to establish the judicial courts of the United States," passed in 1789.

In the statement made by the Secretary of State, he refers to the practice of the Legislature of Massachusetts in cases embracing the same principles which are involved in the one under consideration; these, however, cannot be resorted to as precedents, unless it be made to appear that the question has been discussed and decided in that body. The existence of the cases, and suffering them to pass by without investigation, is no evidence that they were in conformity with the constitution of the State. To contest the election of a person who is the choice of the people, is a very unpleasant task, one that few will undertake, and from that cause alone persons not eligible may have been permitted to retain seats in Legislative bodies. But it does not follow from this, that it was not an infraction of the principles of the constitution. But it is contended by Mr. Bailey that, as he was in the employ of the General Government while in this District, and had expressed an intention of returning to Massachusetts, he still remains an inhabitant of that State, but the committee are unable to perceive the force of the reasoning by which this position is attempted to be maintained. It is true that, by writers on the laws of nations, ambassadors and other agents who go out as such from one Government to reside near that of another, are considered as carrying with them the sovereignty of the Government to which they belong; that their rights as citizens are not impaired by such absence, and that children born in the houses they occupy are considered as born within the territory and jurisdiction of the Government in whose service they are. But the analogy between the cases is not discovered; the one is the case of an agent in a foreign country, not possessing the capacity, by residence in that country, to become one of its citizens, or to lose his allegiance to the country from which he comes; the other is that of a person employed in the service of the General Government within its territory, but without the limits of the State of which he claims to be an inhabitant. That which appertains to Ministers of this Government, who represent the sovereignty of the nation in foreign countries, whatever it may be, cannot be supposed to attach to those in subordinate employments at home. The relation which the States bear to each other, is very different from that which the Union bears to foreign Governments; the several States, by their own constitutions, prescribed the conditions by which the citizens of one State shall become citizens of another; and over this subject the Government of the Union has no control; it would, therefore, be altogether fallacious to pretend that the bare holding of an appointment under the General Government, and residing for years in one of the States, should preclude the holder from being an inhabitant and citizen of such State, when, by its constitution and laws, he is recognised as such. How the expression of an intention to return at some future time to the State from which the person had come, can affect the citizenship and inhabitancy thus acquired, is impossible to comprehend. If citizenship in one part of the Union was only to be acquired by a formal renunciation of allegiance to the State from which the person came, previous to his being admitted to the rights of citizenship in the State to which he had removed, the expression of an intention to return would be of importance; but, as it is, it can have no bearing on the case; the doctrine is not applicable to citizens of this confederacy removing from one State, and settling in another; nor can it, in the present case, be considered as going to establish inhabitancy in Massachusetts, when the fact is conceded that, at the time of the election, and for nearly six years before, Mr. Bailey was actually an inhabitant of the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and, by the charter of the city, and the laws in force in the District, was, to all intents and purposes, as much an inhabitant thereof as though he had been born, and resided there during the whole period of his life; and the refusal to exercise the rights of a citizen can be of no consequence in the case. It is not the exercise of privileges that constitutes a citizen; it is being a citizen that gives the title to those privileges. But there is one other circumstance attending this case that remains to be noticed, and which, it is presumed, cannot fail to explain the true character of Mr. Bailey's residence in the District of Columbia; the ground he assumes is that, although he was resident in the District, his domicile was his father's house in Massachusetts. Vattel says, (book 1, chap 19, sec. 218,) "The natural or original domicile is that given us by our birth, where our father had his, and we are considered as retaining it till we have abandoned it in order to choose another. The domicile acquired is that where we settle by our choice." A question now presents itself for solution. What shall be considered an abandonment of the natural or original domicile? The reason why the father's house should be considered as the domicile of the son is, that, previous to the marriage of the children, they all constitute but one family, of which the father is the head, and his house their common home, so long as they choose to remain in it; but if the son absents himself for years, and, in the mean time, marries a wife, he then assumes the character of the head of a family himself; and the relation in which he before stood to his father's family is thereby entirely changed, and the original domicile must be considered as abandoned, and a new one established where he and his wife continue to reside. This is precisely Mr. Bailey's case; he had left his father's house in Massachusetts, and taken up his residence in Washington city, where he had remained for nearly six years, and where he was at the time of the election; he had married a wife in this city, and his habitation was with the family of her mother; can he, thus situated, have any reasonable ground on which to claim that he is an inhabitant of Massachusetts? The opinion is entertained by some that the government of the District of Columbia being rather of an anomalous character, a residence here would not carry with it the same consequences that would attend the settlement in one of the States of the Union; but the distinction, as applicable to the present case, the committee have not been able to discover. It has also been suggested that, as the United States have the exclusive jurisdiction over the District, each State may be considered as possessing a part, and that although a person formerly a citizen of Massachusetts, or of any other State, may be resident here, yet he is not out of the jurisdiction of his own State. This is an argument more subtle than sound and conclusive. If that view be correct, the limits of the individual States will be found to be vastly more extensive than was ever heretofore supposed; because the same rule that will apply to the District of Columbia, will also apply to the whole of the territory purchased by the General Government, either from individual States or foreign nations. The doctrine is manifestly erroneous. The rights and interests of the individual States, in every thing of a national character, are merged in those of the General Government, the powers of which, within its sphere, are complete and indivisible.

The committee have carefully, and they trust impartially, considered the subject referred to them; they have examined it in every aspect in which it has presented itself to their minds; they have assiduously endeavored to ascertain the true intent and meaning of that part of the Constitution of the United States by which the case is to be tested and decided; and they have presented to the House some of the reasons which have induced the conclusion to which they have arrived. They regret extremely that the duty which they owe to themselves, to the House, and the nation, would not permit them to accord in opinion with the citizens of that portion of the State of Massachusetts immediately interested in the decision of the question; but believing, as they do, that the choice of that district was made in direct opposition to an express provision of the Constitution of the United States, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Bailey is not entitled to a seat in this House."

PETITION AGAINST SITTING MEMBER.

To the honorable the House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, being inhabitants of the district of Norfolk, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and duly qualified voters for a Representative of said district in the Congress of the United States, do respectfully petition and remonstrate with your honorable body against the return of John Bailey, Esq., as a Representative of said district, in the eighteenth Congress of the United States; and do respectfully pray that the said Bailey may not be admitted to a seat in said Congress as the Representative of said district, for the following reasons:

Because, by the first section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that no person shall be a representative, who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen.

Because, at the time when the election was held, at which the said Bailey was supposed to have been chosen, he was not an inhabitant of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, but then was, and for many years before had been, and still is, as the undersigned have been informed and verily believe, an inhabitant of the city of Washington, and District of Columbia; and, therefore, was not eligible as a representative of said district or any other district within said Commonwealth, by the express letter, and in conformity with the true spirit and intention of the Constitution of the United States.

In answer to the questions proposed to me by the Committee of Elections of the House of Representatives of the United States, in relation to Mr. John Bailey, I have the honor of stating—

First. That Mr. Bailey was appointed a clerk in the Department of State on the 1st of October, 1817.

Second. That his letter, resigning that appointment, was dated the 21st, and received by me the 23d of October, 1823. His resignation was immediately accepted, and an appointment made to supply his place.

Third. The duties performed by Mr. Bailey were those of a clerk, at the salary of 1,600 dollars a year, that being the highest salary, next to that of the chief clerk, allowed by law. They were different at different periods of his service. During the two or three last years, he had charge of the diplomatic correspondence, the most important and confidential portion of the duties of the office.

Fourth. A certificate of appointment is always given to the clerks in the department, appointed by authority of law. A copy of that given to Mr. Bailey is herewith delivered to the committee.

Fifth. Mr. Bailey's residence, at the time of his appointment, was in the State of Massachusetts, in the district which he has now been elected to represent. On tendering to him the appointment of a clerk in the Department of State, I invited him, in the event of his accepting it, to repair to this city, to take upon him the performance of its duties, which he immediately did. His residence, during the time he held the office, was necessarily in this District; but he never, to my knowledge, exercised any of the rights of citizenship within the District. I always understood him as considering the State of Massachusetts as his home, and his residence here as merely temporary, and occasioned by his necessary attendance upon the duties of his office. At two different periods, he asked my opinion, whether I thought him eligible, as a Representative in Congress for the district in Massachusetts to which he belonged; and I answered him, that I did. Upon one, or both of those occasions, I mentioned to him the general reasons of my opinion, founded upon the common principle of national law, that the animus revertendi, or intention of return, constitutes the test of domicile, for the preservation of political rights to persons absent from home; and upon the practice, conformable to this principle, in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, examples of which were within my own knowledge.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

WASHINGTON, January 8, 1824.

In pursuance of authority, under the act of Congress passed on the eleventh day of September, 1789, entitled "An act for establishing the salaries of the Executive officers of Government, with their assistants and clerks," I do hereby appoint John Bailey a clerk in the Department of State.

Given under my hand, at Washington, this first day of October, 1817.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, 10th January, 1824.

SIR: In answer to the questions of Mr. Bailey, enclosed in your letter of the 19th instant, I have the honor of stating as follows:

To the first. That I returned to the United States, from Berlin, in September, 1801, after an absence of seven years. I was elected a member of the Senate of Massachusetts in April, 1802.

Second. Mr. Eustis returned from the Netherlands in the summer of 1819.

Third. Mr. Gore returned to the United States, from England, in 1804, and was elected Governor of Massachusetts in 1809.

Fourth. Mr. Benjamin Hichborn and General William Hull were both members of the Senate of Massachusetts in the year 1802 with me. They had both, within five years before that time, been absent in Europe upon their private concerns. Mr. Hichborn's absence had been of several years continuance.

I am, with great respect, sir, yours, &c.

Massachusetts Contested Election.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

I have been acquainted with Mr. John W. Bailey from my arrival in this city, in January, 1818, to the present time. He has resided in a public hotel, with occasional absences on visits to Massachusetts, until his marriage in this city, which took place about a year since; at which time he took his residence with the family of his wife's mother, where he still remains.

With respect to the exercise of the privileges of a citizen, I know no act which, in this District, can be so entitled, unless it be the voting for city officers at the annual elections, or holding an office in the corporation. I do not know that Mr. Bailey has voted in any case for city officers, and believe that he has never held any office of the corporation. I do not know what is the interest or property which Mr. Bailey has in Massachusetts, the supervision of which he claims as constituting his inhabitancy there.

CHARLES BULFINCH.

J. SLOANE, Chairman.

STATEMENT OF MR. BAILEY.

To the Committee of Elections, H. R.

GENTLEMEN: It was suggested, when I first had the honor of meeting you in session, on the 7th instant, that the true question in my case was the question, quo animo? What was my intention relative to my residence at Washington? Was it intended to be permanent, or only temporary? If the latter, my inhabitancy in Massachusetts remained; if the former, it was lost.

I beg leave to state some facts bearing on the question, and to add a few remarks.

It is proper to remark, that those provisions of our constitutions and laws which require inhabitancy as a qualification for holding office, have in all parts of the country, it is believed, received a liberal and not a rigid construction. And it is just that there should be a liberal construction, since there is scarcely the slightest danger of any extensive evil arising from it. We find that in those States where members of Congress are chosen in districts, it is very rare, indeed, that a person is elected who is not an inhabitant of the district in which he is chosen, though such inhabitancy is not at all a requisite. Equally rare, probably more so, would be the election of a person not an inhabitant of the State, even if the Constitution of the United States had not made inhabitancy a requisite.

The reason which led our predecessors to establish inhabitancy so generally as a requisite for holding office, was probably this: They had seen the enormous abuses which had taken place in England, connected with the election to Parliament of persons who were almost entire strangers to those whom they represented. Those members were very often the devoted, and often the pensioned supporters of a powerful Ministry. In their minds, therefore, the ideas of non-inhabitancy and of ministerial influence were intimately associated. Hence, the provision of inhabitancy was almost universally engrafted into our constitutions; notwithstanding our more equal representation, the greater number and intelligence of our electors, and the idea, whether true or false, that each section of our country has its peculiar interests, rendered such a provision almost useless.

This view of the probable origin of a provision which in this country seems unnecessary, shows that the liberal construction which by universal consent it receives among us, is a perfectly just and proper construction. The right of suffrage and the settlement of paupers are construed more rigidly, and properly so. A loose construction of the former would tend to defeat the will of a majority of the people; and, of the latter, would impose on them improper pecuniary burdens. But, in the case of eligibility, neither of these evils can result.

This liberal construction is peculiarly proper in relation to the District of Columbia. Stronger evidence of an intention to become a permanent inhabitant of it than of any other part of our country, ought to be required before such intention is presumed. It is subject to the exclusive legislation of Congress; of a body which is the Legislature of Massachusetts as well as of the District of Columbia. By coming to this District, I came under no new jurisdiction—the jurisdiction of no Government under whose jurisdiction I had not previously lived. Suppose I had been in the Army or Navy of the United States, and been stationed solely and for several years at an island in Boston harbor, subject to the exclusive legislation of the United States: is it believed that I should have ceased to be an inhabitant of Massachusetts? Yet the jurisdiction is precisely the same. And though the inhabitants of the District of Columbia have a right to elect charter officers, even this pittance of a right is held at the mere sufferance of Congress. That body can, at any moment revoke the right.

There are several points in the laws regulating the District of Columbia, (such, for example, as the one giving to aliens the power of holding real estate,) which prove that this District was intended as a great thoroughfare of the nation, an estate in joint tenancy, a spot which should form, in a certain sense, a part or appendage of every State in the Union, and which is, therefore, placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the common Government of these States.

Thus, the very condition and uses of the District of Columbia show the propriety of a liberal construction of the doctrine of inhabitancy, in relation to persons employed in it by the Government.

Another ground of liberal construction is the fact, that there is no person claiming the seat which, it is alleged, ought to be vacated. Were there such a person, liberality to the sitting member might be injustice to him. But none such is found. To vacate the seat would necessarily leave the district without representation for a portion of the session. A liberal construction therefore, gives effect to the right of representation, without injustice to a rival candidate.

If any thing could further show the propriety of a liberal construction in this case, it would be the clandestine and novel origin and progress of the remonstrances before the committee, tending to prove that the whole complaint originated, and has been pursued, from personal motives. Several weeks before the meeting of Congress, a large number of blank remonstrances were printed, and circulated, anonymously, through the post office, addressed to the municipal officers and other persons in the twenty-six towns into which the district is divided, with a manuscript request on the margin to those persons to obtain signatures, and send them to some member of Congress from the State.

About a week after the commencement of the session, two of these papers, together containing twenty-six signatures, were received by a member, in an anonymous letter, requesting him to present them to the House; and they were presented and committed

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Massachusetts Contested Election.

before I knew of their existence. Though this letter had only a fictitious signature, the member who received it is confident that he knows the handwriting. And what shows that the remonstrances were got up from personal motives, and not from zeal to preserve the Constitution inviolate, is the fact that the name of the undoubted writer of this anonymous letter does not itself appear on either remonstrance. Another fact is, that, at the election, the writer of this anonymous letter received nearly the same number of votes, in his own town, as there were names on the remonstrances, which were also from the same town.

When, therefore, we consider that even the genuineness of the signatures is questionable, as they came through an anonymous, and therefore irresponsible channel; that, waiving this objection, still there are but twenty-six remonstrants, equivalent to one elector, in each town, in a district which has several thousand electors; that they are but few more in number than the votes given at the election for the person who obtained and forwarded the signatures, and that they merely express their belief that the person elected was not an inhabitant of the State, sustaining the allegation by no proof whatever, while a contrary belief was expressed, by a thousand electors, in the fact of his election: when we consider all these circumstances, we see much to convince us that these remonstrances originated in personal motives, and very little to convince us that papers of so informal and questionable a character, are entitled to great respect from the House or its committee.

One of the oldest, most experienced, and best informed members of the House, on hearing the circumstances, expressed his belief that no instance could be found in which papers of such a character were ever even received by the House. If they should not only be received, but be made the ground of the dismission of a member from the House, it would be still more remarkable.

These circumstances, aided by the general reason in favor of a liberal construction before noticed, render it proper that the clear and undeniable will of the people of the district should not be set aside on any other than the most unequivocal grounds. That such grounds do not exist; is, it is believed, most manifest.

The question is, was my residence in Washington intended by me to be permanent, or only temporary? If permanent, my inhabitaney in Massachusetts was lost; if temporary, it was not lost. Mere residence, of itself, cannot destroy inhabitaney. This all admit. Innumerable examples and authorities prove it. Before we infer the loss of inhabitaney, we must show some facts indicating intention of permanent residence.

The testimony of Mr. Adams, that he always understood me as considering Massachusetts my home, and my residence here as merely temporary, joined with the testimony of both Mr. Adams, and Mr. Bulfinch, (witnesses who were not called at my request,) that they never had knowledge of any exercise by me of the political rights of a citizen of the District of Columbia, is a satisfactory proof in my favor, unless some opposite proof can be brought to countervail it.

No such proof, I am sure, can be found. On the contrary, my whole course, during my residence here, has been in entire conformity to this testimony. And I declare, solemnly and distinctly, that it was always my intention to continue an inhabitant of Massachusetts. In the civil concerns of the District of Columbia, I have never exercised a single privilege, or been required to perform a single duty of an inhabitant; have never held a local office, or given a vote, or even had the right of voting, and have never owned any real estate, or paid or been assessed in any tax whatsoever. I was at a public hotel till within less than a year before my election, when I was invited to reside in a private family as long as it should be pleasing, keeping, while there, no house, no table, or domestics, but living as one friend would live while on a visit to another friend. On repeated occasions, in conversation and letters, I have expressed the temporary nature of my residence here, and my most intimate friends have distinctly so understood it. My library, consisting of between seven and eight hundred volumes, and constituting nearly all my visible property, I left chiefly (taking with me only a small part for temporary use) in the house of my father, where I had resided, and where they still remain for my use on my return. There, also, I have spent a portion of nearly every Autumn previous to that in which I was elected.

Of these facts I most freely challenge contradiction. They cannot be contradicted with truth. They are already corroborated by testimony now before the committee. Unless, therefore, some testimony should be obtained, which I am sure cannot be obtained from honest persons, the conclusion is irresistible that my intention was to make a merely temporary residence. And I venture to say that, if inhabitaney is not retained by an absentee, for a term of years, under such circumstances as these, it would be impossible for him to retain it under any circumstances whatever.

That the inhabitants of Norfolk district considered me as also an inhabitant, is proved by several facts. A few days before a meeting of citizens to nominate a candidate, I was written to, and asked if I were willing to be supported as a candidate. The reply was affirmative. The meeting was probably the largest ever held in the district on a similar occasion, every town having been represented, and the nomination was supported by nearly three-fourths of it. And, at the election, though there were several candidates, the successful one had a decided majority over all the others, in coincidence with the principle governing elections in the Eastern States. These facts occurred, too, in a State in which there has never been known a single instance of the election to Congress of a person who was not an inhabitant of the very district in which he was chosen. They clearly show the opinion of that portion of the Union, who probably best knew the nature of my connexion with it, and who certainly were most interested to prevent an improper choice. They undoubtedly supposed that a person who was a native of that district, whose immediate connexions nearly all resided in it, and who had represented a portion of it in the State Legislature for several years, could not be held to have expatriated himself, without some clear and unequivocal proof, of which none whatever existed. They had seen me go to a neighboring State, Rhode Island, and spend four years at college in my education, and then return to my native district. They had seen me, at the end of a year revisit the same college, and spend six years there as one of the instructors, and then return again to my native district. And though they had, at the time of the election, seen me employed nearly as long by the Government at Washington as I had been, in the second instance, in Rhode Island, they did not doubt that my attachment to my native district continued, and that my avowed intention to return was sincere; nor could they, for a moment, doubt that the House of Representatives of the United States would give the same liberal construction of the doctrine of eligibility, which all preceding Houses, and all our State Legislatures, except when under violent excitements, had uniformly given.

The principle of my eligibility is supported by numerous precedents. Precedents, on this point, though not abstractly and absolutely conclusive, are yet of great weight. They are important as guides of action to individuals. Suppose a person elected to a seat in Congress, under circumstances creating some doubt of his eligibility; and suppose he holds, at the time, an office incompatible with such seat, which he must resign if he accept the latter. He looks to precedents in similar cases, and finds that they all sanction the belief of his eligibility, and he accordingly resigns his previous office, and with it his immediate means of living, on the faith of these precedents. It would be plainly improper to set aside all these precedents, and eject the member from his seat, without the clearest and strongest reasons.

It is admitted that no precedents are found of cases exactly similar to the present. In truth, no two cases can ever be found exactly similar. The object, then, is to find the cases most resembling the one in question. These cases, in every instance that has met my view, without an exception, are in my favor. Not a single case, resembling the present, has been decided unfavorably.

The Constitution of the United States declares that a person elected a member of the House of Representatives must be an inhabitant of the State in which he is chosen; leaving each State, it is presumed, to determine what shall be its own terms of inhabitancy. What are the terms of inhabitancy in Massachusetts?

The constitution of Massachusetts, having been formed before the Constitution of the United States, and even before the completion of the Old Confederation, does not provide for cases of employment in the service of the United States; nor do its laws, it is believed, make any such provision. In practice, however, many cases have occurred; and they all, without one exception, speak the same language, that of liberal construction.

The present Governor of Massachusetts resided several years in Europe as a Minister of the United States; and in about four years after his return was elected the Governor, though the Constitution requires inhabitancy for seven years next preceding the election. Mr. J. Q. Adams resided seven years in Europe, in a similar capacity; and in a few months after his return was elected to the Senate of Massachusetts, though the constitution requires inhabitancy for five years next preceding.

It has been said that the case of a Minister of the United States is not applicable to the present question, as he is said to "carry his country with him." It is scarcely to be believed that, at the present day, such a technicality, a mere legal fiction, will be seriously urged to defeat the clearly expressed will of the people. The utmost that can be said in favor of the Minister is, that he is exempt from the ordinary operation of the laws of the country in which he resides. But it might be doubted whether the exemption is much greater than has been enjoyed in the case in question. But, suppose the exemption greater; how is it possible that a little more or less of such exemption shall have so important a bearing on a person's political rights, that one shall retain his inhabitancy five thousand miles distant from his residence, while another loses his inhabitancy at a distance of five hundred? The distinction is indefensible.

It has been said that the tenure of office is different. In what consists the difference? One is appointed by the President and Senate, the other by the head of a department. Both are removable at pleasure; both have the privilege of resignation; both are subject to the abolition of office; and both continue for life, when neither dismission, resignation, nor abolition of office takes place. There is, therefore, no difference in the tenure of office, that can create a difference of political rights.

It has been said that one has an appointment of honor, while the other has not. Under a republican Government, this distinction seems not at home. It cannot be correct. The grade of the office cannot vary the rights of the man.

It may be said that we are bound to presume in a Minister an intention of returning when he gives up the duties of his station; as his residence afterwards in a foreign country would be attended with fewer political privileges than he would enjoy in his own country, as well as by a deprivation of the society of his relations and friends. The same intention we are equally bound to presume, in the case of giving up employment at Washington, as a further residence in it would be attended by a similar loss of former society, and by a still greater diminution of political privileges, a mere shadow of privilege being all that remains.

Under every aspect of the subject, therefore, no reason presents itself for viewing the case of a Minister as different from the case in question.

But other cases than those of Ministers are found. Mr. Gore, after having resided many years in England, as a commissioner under our treaty with Great Britain of 1794, returned in 1804, and was elected Governor of Massachusetts in 1809, notwithstanding the requisition of inhabitancy for seven years next preceding. He was not a Minister, and therefore carried no country with him. Suppose his election had been contested on the fact of his absence; what would have been the reply? It would have been said, and said justly, that absence, without any evidence of an intention of making it permanent, could not destroy previous inhabitancy. But no contest was attempted. Mr. Hichborn returned from Europe, after an absence of several years on private business, and was elected to the Senate of Massachusetts in 1802, long before the expiration of the five years. And, in 1818, Mr. Crowninshield was strongly supported as a candidate for the office of Governor, without a question of his eligibility being made, though he was at that time, and had been for several years, residing at Washington, and discharging his duties as Secretary of the Navy.

The person whose seat is now contested, returned to his native town in October, 1814, after residing several years as an instructor in the college at Providence, Rhode Island. In May, 1815, he was elected to represent that town in the State Legislature, though inhabitancy in the town for one year next preceding the election is required. Some of his political opponents took the advice of an eminent lawyer, on the question of contesting the election. The advice was against it, and nothing was done. This is a stronger case than the present, as the employment was private, and not by the Government. But as it was in a literary institution, unaccompanied by civil duties or rights, it was deemed that inhabitancy in his native town was not destroyed by it.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Massachusetts Contested Election.

H. OF R.

These instances prove that if the present case were to be decided by the rules and practice of Massachusetts, no doubt of eligibility would exist. Not a single precedent to the contrary is found.

If it be said that it must be decided by the rules and practice of the United States, and not of the particular State in which the person is chosen, the precedents are equally strong. Not one is found unfavorable.

We find a member of the present Congress holding his seat uncontested, though he was elected while residing in Spain as Minister of the United States, though he had been a resident of that country for several years previous, and though his family were residents of the District of Columbia for the first two years of that period, and of Spain for the remainder.

We find Philip Barton Key holding his seat many years ago, under circumstances which prove that a liberal construction of the doctrine of ineligibility is the practice of Congress.

We find that, recently, Captain Hull, of the Navy, who was at the time, and had been for eight years, a resident of Charlestown, in Massachusetts, was styled, in the proceedings of a court of the United States, as of Connecticut, which was his native State; and that a plea in abatement, which was at first filed, was afterwards abandoned as untenable.

We find the Heads of Departments, though residents of the District of Columbia, universally considered as inhabitants of the States, respectively, of which they were inhabitants before appointment. We find Mr. Crawford nominated by the President to the Senate, and commissioned as of Georgia, though he had for nearly two years before been a resident of the District of Columbia. We find Mr. Rush nominated and commissioned as of Pennsylvania, though he had been for several years a resident of the District of Columbia, as Comptroller of the Treasury. And, what is more emphatically to the point, we find Mr. Pleasanton, to whose situation in the Department of State I succeeded, nominated and commissioned as of Delaware, though he had been for sixteen years a resident of the District of Columbia.

We find our greatest and most experienced statesmen, men who stand in the front rank of past and present official stations, as well as of intelligence and integrity, expressing freely, and distinctly and unitedly, the opinion that simple employment at Washington does not at all destroy previous ineligibility elsewhere.

We find in the constitution of Kentucky the following principle: "Absence on the business of this State, or the United States, shall not forfeit a residence once obtained." The same principle is recognised, to a greater or less extent, by the constitutions of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Tennessee, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Alabama. The general election law of Virginia has the following enactment: "No person inhabiting within the District of Columbia, or elsewhere, not within the jurisdiction of this commonwealth, shall be entitled to exercise the right of suffrage therein, except citizens thereof, employed abroad in the service of the United States, or of this commonwealth, and whose foreign residence is occasioned by such service." This law is more specially deserving of notice, as it respects not eligibility, but the right of suffrage, which is universally, and very properly, construed more rigidly than the former.

We find in the Constitution of the United States itself, the doctrine plainly implied, that ineligibility and actual residence are entirely distinct. That Constitution requires that a Senator or Representative in Congress shall be an inhabitant of the State he shall represent. But, in the case of President, it requires that he shall have been fourteen years a resident within the United States. Uniformity would have demanded either that residence should be the requisite for a Senator or Representative, or that fourteen years of ineligibility should be the requisite for a President. But, as the high importance of the trust reposed in a President of the United States, makes long familiarity with the nature and operations of our institutions indispensable, and as a person might be for fourteen years an inhabitant of the United States, in the legal sense, without being an actual resident for half that period, it was judged proper that actual residence should be the test. And as, on the other hand, some of the most intelligent inhabitants of a State may be temporarily absent in the service of their country at the time when a Senator or Representative is to be elected, it was judged proper that ineligibility only, and not actual residence, should be the test.

This view is supported by the journals of the Convention of 1787. We there find that, in the early draughts of the Constitution, the qualification for a Representative or Senator was residence, but afterwards changed to ineligibility, while that for a President was at first ineligibility, but afterwards changed to residence. The fact is remarkable, and shows that the framers of the Constitution made a clear distinction between ineligibility and mere residence.

These facts, showing the practice of Congress, of the Executive, and of the courts, the opinion of our greatest and wisest men, and especially the general will of the nation, as expressed in their constitutions and laws, comprise a body of public sentiment, which is irresistible, while not a single important fact is found favoring the opposite doctrine. If these facts be added to the positions already established, that the great question is that of intention, and that my intention was obviously that of a temporary residence, it is believed that the Committee and the House will be unanimous in the opinion that my eligibility is established.

If, however, any doubt remains, it must be removed by one rule of decision, which in a free Government should never be disregarded. The distinctly expressed will of the people ought never to be set aside on a merely doubtful principle. The principle should be clear indeed, which is vindicated at the expense of this will. As I am sure that the principle is not thus clear against me, I cannot, for a moment, doubt that the decision of the Committee and the House will give the will of the people its due effect.

These remarks are grounded on the point suggested when I had the honor of meeting the committee before, that the great question to be decided is the intention. If any other point be deemed important, I respectfully request that I may be informed.

JOHN BAILEY.

Postscript.

GENTLEMEN: The preceding remarks were grounded on the understanding that the real question before the committee was the question, quo animo? Yesterday, however, I was informed, for the first time, that there was a change of opinion in the committee, and that they now considered that question as not applicable to my case. Though I am still persuaded that that is the real and only question, and am fortified in this persuasion by the highest authorities, all concurring to establish the point, yet some observations will be made in reply to several other points.

1. It is said that though I am unquestionably a citizen of Massachusetts, yet I am not an inhabitant; there being a distinction between the meanings of those two terms.

Perhaps it would be difficult to draw very clearly this distinction, since the terms appear to be used quite synonymously in the articles of the Confederation, in many of our State constitutions, and in numerous works of high authority. But suppose the distinction exists. I have attempted no argument whatever, on any supposed identity of their meaning. I have adduced precedents, and added some observations to show that I am an inhabitant of Massachusetts, according to the Constitutional sense of the term. If the precedents and observations have any force, they tend to prove my inhabitancy, without any attempt to blend this question with that of citizenship.

2. It is said that the Constitution of the United States required inhabitancy of the State, in order to prevent the influence of the State governments from being merged in that of the General Government.

We will not stop to enforce the remark that this reason applies as strongly to all our foreign Ministers as to the case in question. The conclusive reply to the proposition is, that nearly all the States, whose constitutions have been framed since that of the United States, have expressly provided that absence from those States in the service of the General Government shall not be a disqualification for certain given offices. And Virginia, whose zeal in defence of the rights of the States is second to none, has established the liberal principle that its citizens shall enjoy even the more rigidly construed right of suffrage, though residing in the District of Columbia, provided such residence is occasioned by their employment in the service of the United States.

It would be a singular spectacle to see the General Government become the champion of the rights of the States, in opposition to the explicit regulations of the States themselves.

3. It is said that a person, who is for years absent from his home, loses his inhabitancy, unless he leaves there something which requires his attention or supervision.

It may properly be asked, in the first place, if this be not a perfectly arbitrary principle, unsupported by any authority whatever.

It may be said, in the next place, that the position is erroneous. No such fact is essential. It is merely one of the many evidences tending to prove an intention to return. The intention may often, however, be sufficiently proved by other circumstances, where this does not exist.

In the next place, it may be replied, that the fact does exist in the case in question. Nearly all my library was left; which fact is perfectly unaccountable, except on the ground that I intended to return. Though this may seem trifling property to those whose fortunes are splendid, yet, as it happened to be the owner's all, its humble nature is as significant in its application to the present question, as would be the treasures of the affluent.

4. It is said that merely an expression of an intention to return to one's former residence is not sufficient to sustain inhabitancy.

This has never been contended. The principle asserted is, that when such intention has been expressed, and when the whole train of circumstances unite to corroborate that expression, particularly the mere disconnection with the civil concerns of the temporary place of residence, then, previous inhabitancy is not lost.

5. It is said that inhabitancy, in the meaning of the Constitution, is the mere fact of living at a place; as a head of a department lives at Washington; as a Minister of the United States lives at a foreign Court; or, as a member of Congress lives at Washington during the session.

That such a doctrine as this should be seriously entertained, is indeed remarkable. Its hostility to all known authorities and precedents, to the express provisions of our State constitutions, and to the clear opinions of our soundest statesmen and jurists, is too glaring for comment.

We must then revert to the original question, and the real question in the case—Did I take up my residence here, with the intention of making it my permanent residence, or not? To attempt to evade this question, and substitute some other, the fiction of our own minds, is doing injustice to the rights of the community.

If we go to foreign authorities, (though it is doubted whether the question be not too purely American,) we find the following:

"The domicile is the habitation fixed in any place, with an intention of always staying there. A man does not then establish his domicile in any place, unless he makes sufficiently known his intention of fixing there, either tacitly, or by an express declaration." Vattel, b. 1, ch. 13, sec. 218.

If we take the highest American judicial authority, we have this:

"Domicil is a residence in a country, with the intention, either tacitly or expressly declared, of making it a permanent place of abode."

"If a party has made no express declaration as to his intention of permanently residing in a country, his acts must be attended to, as affording the most satisfactory evidence of his intention."—8 Cranch, 278, 279.

Authorities might be multiplied to prove that this intention has always been held to be the true test of inhabitancy. All our tribunals, whether legislative or judicial, prove it. To create a new principle for the present case, would be manifestly unjust.

JOHN BAILEY.

FEBRUARY 17, 1824.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The resolution yesterday offered by Mr. OWEN, proposing certain inquiries by the Committee of Ways and Means, respecting the operation of the proposed tariff, &c., was taken up.

Mr. BRENT, of Louisiana, rose in support of the resolution—the object of which, he said, was not to procrastinate the debate, but to procure information which ought to be possessed before a vote could properly be given on the bill. He insisted that the subject came appropriately within the cognizance of the Committee of Ways and Means, and a report was the more wanting because some, even of the friends of the bill, had declared that if it led to internal taxation, they would oppose its passage. It had been urged that the nation were already in full possession of the subject, and that Congress possessed already, from the discussions of last year, all necessary light on the subject; but this did not appear to be the case since some had professed to have received, already, from the discussion thus far, had on the details of this bill, more information than they got from all the long discussions of last session on the general measure. Mr. B. concluded with repeating the profession of his friendly disposition towards manufactures and their protection, provided other interests of society were not to be sacrificed.

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, objected to the inquiry proposed in the resolution, as it could not, in his opinion, aid the main object before the House. It was impossible for the committee to make any useful or certain report till the bill had gone through its last modification; and he was confident the effect of the resolution would only be to procrastinate a decision, without rendering it any more correct. If once the inquiry was given to this committee, we should soon hear gentlemen say, they "could not proceed till they had the report—why urge the discussion—a committee has the subject under consideration, let us wait to hear what is their conclusion; and when obtained, it would be a mere opinion, and would bind nobody." Besides, if the Committee of Ways and Means must report the operation of the bill on revenue, other gentlemen might urge that the Committee on Agriculture should afterwards tell the House how it would affect that interest, and when they had reported, some other gentlemen would be very anxious for a similar report from the Committee on Commerce, and thus we were to proceed till the session was wasted away, and then put off the bill because it was too late to act upon it.

Mr. CULPEPER, of North Carolina, observed, that the objections urged by the member last up, rather went to confirm him in his support of the measure. If so much information was needed, ought not the House to pause before they went into the measure?

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, could perceive no good consequence likely to arise from the resolution. It would be impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means, or any other committee, or any human being, to say precisely what would be the practical operation of all the parts of so extensive a bill—what articles would cease to be imported, or whether the proceeds of duties would be diminished or increased on each item. It must be mere conjecture after all, and would be governed by gentlemen's feelings with respect to the bill. The gentlemen were in the House and could hear their conjectures and opinions, as well on this floor as in a report; but as to the Committee of Ways and Means, the House had already the opinion of its chairman—(who probably expressed the opinion of the committee) that protecting duties to manufactures would increase instead of diminishing the revenue. Mr. S. concluded by moving that the resolution lie on the table; but afterwards consented to withdraw this motion.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, said he had, on a former occasion, professed himself friendly to manufactures. He still felt so—but his situation in life had not afforded him the same opportunity as some of the gentlemen possessed, of becoming acquainted with the operation of such a bill as that now proposed, on the revenue. He wished for information. It was true the table had been crowded with memorials for and against the measure; but it would be a task to read one half of them—yet he could not vote blindfold. He thought that there would be time to digest the report before near all the speeches now in embryo on the subject, had reached their birth. It had been said, and he wanted to know if it was true, that the bill would strike off, at a blow, a great sum from the revenue.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, thought nothing would be gained by the resolution. He must correct an error into which gentlemen had fallen. They seemed to represent it as a thing conceded by the friends of the bill, that it was to diminish the revenue. He protested against any such idea. The friends of the bill made no such concession. On the contrary, if he could not demonstrate that it would increase the revenue from three to five millions of dollars, in three years, and beat down completely all arguments to the contrary, he should think he had taken leave of his senses. On that subject, weak as were his powers, he was willing to meet a Hercules, (and he knew that this House contained such.) If gentlemen hardened their ears, and would not be convinced, there was, to be sure, no convincing them. The measure had been before the House since 1789, and no reference had ever before been proposed to committees, to learn its operation. He had the deepest respect for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, but if that gentleman should declare, that the tariff bill would impair the revenue, he would not believe him. He would bow to no man's calculations. Even those of Mr. Madison, when laid before this House on a former occasion, were not received as being wholly correct, or as final authority. But if gentlemen wanted the opinion of an individual on the subject, the proper officer to apply to was the Secretary of the Treasury. He was at the head of the finances of the country, and ought to be competent, if any man should be, to give the information now sought for.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, then rose, and said that, although disposed to accord with any gentleman in seeking to obtain important and necessary information, he thought that the present resolution proposed to go out of the ordinary and settled course. He conceived it to be in contravention of the principles on which the standing committees of this House were organized. They were appointed to devise means for effecting any end proposed by the House—especially the Committee of Ways and Means, whose name appropriately described the ends of its appointment. If any measure determined on in the House should be found to affect the revenue, it was then the duty of that committee, to propose the remedy. But while a measure was pending here, the duties of that committee, in relation to it, were suspended till the House had acted. As to a decrease of revenue being produced by this bill, if it should be shown that the bill went to increase the actual wealth of the country, he was under no apprehensions for the revenue. The bill, in that case, could at most only change the mode of collecting it. The usual reports on subjects of revenue had hitherto been received from the Secretary of the Treasury; and, should the House agree to apply to the Committee of Ways and Means, that committee would have at last to go to the Secretary of the Treasury for the facts.

H. OF R.

Military Appropriation Bill.

[Mr. OWEN here said he was willing to modify his resolution in any manner so as to attain his object.]

Mr. INGHAM replied, it was not his intention to move such an amendment, nor could he support the resolution, even if so modified. The result could be nothing more than vain speculations. Who could tell whether the amount imported or consumed would remain the same as now? Besides, there was one large class of articles on which no specific calculations could be made—he meant those on which ad valorem duties were imposed. Cotton bagging, for instance, belongs to a large class of hempen goods, and cannot be separated in its result from the rest, with any accuracy at all. The bill, as now shaped, was a compound of a bill for revenue and a bill for protection. He somewhat doubted the policy of such an amalgamation, but it was now done, and he should not oppose it. All the changes which it proposed, from ad valorem to specific duties, belonged to that part of the bill which went to increase the revenue. The measure, nearly in its present form, had been before the nation since 1820, and if gentlemen wanted information they ought to have asked for it at an earlier stage of the discussion.

Mr. GARNETT said that, though the information was important, the mode of obtaining it was not so; and since the gentleman from Kentucky had so kindly proffered demonstration upon the subject, he proposed that the House should apply to that gentleman in preference either to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means or the Secretary of the Treasury. He preferred certainty to speculation; and, as the gentleman had it in his power to give the House demonstration, he should think very hardly of him if he refused it. The gentleman has told us that an increase of duty produces an increase of tax—a principle for which the House were certainly indebted to him. But, as to the effect of duty upon revenue, we had an example before us in the case of England, from which it appeared that an increase of duties did not always produce an increase of revenue. In the case of teas, and he believed several other articles, when the duty was raised the revenue was diminished, and when the duty was afterwards diminished the revenue increased. The experiment had been several times repeated, and with the same result.

He presumed the gentleman from Kentucky would not say that duties absolutely prohibitory would increase the revenue; but, as he was possessed of full information on the whole subject, and prepared to demonstrate, the House certainly needed nothing from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. TRIMBLE said that the only reason why he had not gone into the demonstration was, because the general effect of the bill had not yet come up for discussion. He could not well introduce it on a motion about figs and oranges. But if the gentleman from Virginia would go with him into a committee-room, (it would take up too much of the time of the House,) if he did not convince him, before he rose, that this bill would increase the revenue, then he would agree to vote with that gentleman; unless, indeed, the gentleman hardened his ears.

Mr. GARNETT replied, that he should have said nothing about figs and oranges, had he not perceived that wheat was in the bill.

Here the debate was arrested by the Speaker, who announced the orders of the day.

MILITARY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. TAYLOR in the Chair,) on the bill making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1824.

The following blanks in the bill were filled up:

For contingencies of the Army	-	$20,000
Armories	-	360,000
Ordnance service	-	42,000
Pensions to Revolutionary pensioners	-	1,291,716 39

Mr. BRECK here made some remarks, not on the amount of this item, but on the want of punctuality in the payment of the pensions. They were, professedly, to be paid in March, but were often not paid till June; by which distressing disappointments were, sometimes suffered by aged and infirm soldiers; inasmuch, that they had in some cases assigned their right to receive their pension, at a discount of twenty per cent., to persons who took an ungenerous advantage of their necessities.

Mr. McLANE explained this delay as attributable not to the Department of War, but to the late period at which the annual appropriation bill sometimes passed this House.

For pensions of invalids, commutation pensioners, and widows and orphans	-	$313,174 42
Arrearages in War Department	-	26,000 60
Arming the new fortifications	-	100,000 00

Much conversation took place on this item between Messrs. COCKE, McLANE, and HAMILTON. The report of Colonel Bomford was read, explanations were given, and inquiries proposed; when, finally, on motion of Mr. McLANE, this item was stricken from the present bill, (with a view to its insertion in the other appropriation bill, at the close of the session, by which time farther information would be obtained.)

The Committee then rose, and reported the bill with the amendments.

The questions being successively put, on concurring in the several amendments—

Mr. COCKE moved further to amend the bill by striking out therefrom the following paragraph :

"For the purchase of Gridley's farm, ten thousand dollars : Provided such farm shall not be purchased, unless the same shall be procured for said ten thousand dollars."

Mr. RANDOLPH moved to amend the said paragraph, by inserting therein, after the word farm, these words, "with the consent of the State of New York."

And, on the question to agree to this latter motion, there appeared—yeas 85, nays 84, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Massachusetts, Archer, Bailey, P. P. Barbour, Bartlett, Bassett, Blair, Brent, Brown, Buck, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of Ohio, Cary, Cocke, Conner, Crafts, Culpeper, Day, Dwinell, Edwards of North Carolina, Ellis, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Foots of New York, Frost, Fuller, Garrison, Garnett, Gazlay, Gist, Hall, Hayden, Hayward, Herrick, Hogeboom, Houston, Jenkins, J. The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to regulate the surveying of public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama;" in which bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. VAN RENSSELAER moved that, when the House adjourns, it adjourn to Monday next.

An attempt was made to take the yeas and nays on this question, but did not succeed; and the question being put on Mr. VAN RENSSELAER's motion, was carried—ayes 99. And then the House adjourned.

MONDAY, February 23.

Mr. FULLER presented a memorial of Joseph Stroud, of the city of Westminster, in the county of Middlesex, in England, mariner, and Martha his wife, the only surviving child and heiress at law of Jonathan Carver, formerly of the United States, but lately of the city of London, deceased, praying that a petition, which has been heretofore presented to Congress, on behalf of some pretended heirs of said Carver, may be disposed of, and that the right of the said Martha may be recognised to a large tract of land on the river Mississippi, near the Falls of St. Anthony, and that measures may be taken by the Government for the protection and recovery of the estate and effects, in America, late of the said Jonathan Carver, deceased.

Mr. TEST presented a memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, praying that some relief may be devised and granted to those who purchased public lands, and which became forfeited to the Government, together with the payments thereon, previous to the passage of the act for the relief of purchasers of public lands before the 1st of July, 1820.

Mr. PRINCE presented a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, "relative to taxing lands within that State."

The said memorials and resolutions were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. CUTHBERT presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the city of Savannah, in the State of Georgia, setting forth, that they are natives of foreign countries, and, upon their arrival in the United States, reported themselves to the clerks of the Courts of the United States, and signed a declaration of their intention to become citizens of the said States. That they have taken the necessary oaths, and have ever since, until lately, esteemed themselves citizens of the United States. That it appears, by a decision recently given by the District Courts of the United States, for the district of Georgia, that, in consequence of not reporting themselves, and signing the declaration before-mentioned, in open court, their acts of naturalization are illegal, and they are declared to be aliens, and praying that an act may be passed to legalize the acts by which it was supposed they became citizens of the United States, respectively.

The SPEAKER presented a petition of sundry counsellors and attorneys at law, admitted as practitioners in the Court of the United States, for the Seventh Circuit, and Kentucky district, representing the numerous defects which, in their opinion, exist in the judicial establishment of the United States, and praying for a re-organization, amendment, and extension of said system, in the manner therein specified and set forth.

The said memorial and petition were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JENNINGS presented to the House resolutions adopted by the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, approbatory of the sentiments contained in the Message of the President of the United States to the two Houses of Congress, at the commencement of the present session, in reference to the relations between the United States and foreign governments; which were laid on the table.

Mr. McLANE, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to secure the accountability of public officers and others," reported the same, with an amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications:

I. From the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, relative to the accounts for disbursements in the Indian Department, prepared in compliance with the 3d section of the act of the 6th of May, 1822; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

II. A report from the Secretary of War on the petition of John Stone; which was laid on the table.

III. From the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copies of the reports rendered to the Treasury Department by the incorporated banks in the District of Columbia, showing the state of their affairs on the 31st December, 1823; which were laid on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Johnson; in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

Engrossed bills, of the following titles, to wit: An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1824; An act giving the consent and sanction of Congress to a certain act of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Florida; were respectively read the third time, and passed.

Bills from the Senate of the following titles, viz.: 1st. An act to regulate the surveying of public and private lands, in the southern part of Alabama; 2d. An act for the relief of James Johnson; were respectively read the first and second time, and referred, the first to the Committee on the Public Lands, the second to the Committee of Claims.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES.

The following Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, viz:

FIRST.

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

The House of Representatives, on the 12th instant, having "resolved that the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the rules and regulations compiled by General Scott, for the government of the Army, are now in force in the Army, or any part thereof; and by what authority the same has been adopted and enforced," I, herewith, transmit a report from the Department of War, which contains the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 23, 1824.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 16, 1824.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President of the United States to inform that House "whether the rules and regulations compiled by General Scott, for the government of the Army, are now in force in the Army, or any part thereof, and by what authority the same has been adopted and enforced," has the honor to state that, after the repeal of the 14th section of the act of the 2d of March, 1821, which established the book of rules and regulations compiled by General Scott for the government of the Army, the President caused the said book of rules and regulations to be continued in force, by general order, a copy of which is, herewith, enclosed.

Respectfully submitted. J. C. CALHOUN.

ADJ'T GENERAL'S OFFICE, May 22, 1822.

ORDERS: The fourteenth section of the act of the 2d of March, 1821, having been repealed by the act of the 7th of May, 1822, "the general regulations for the Army" rest solely on the sanction of the President of the United States. The said regulations are, therefore, continued in force by his authority, in all cases where they do not conflict with positive legislation.

By order: CHARLES J. NOURSE,
Acting Adjutant General.

The Message and report were ordered to lie on the table.

SECOND.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

Agreeably to a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the eleventh instant, requesting the President of the United States "to inform this House if the line intended to constitute the Western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, has been run, in conformity with the provisions of the third section of the act of Congress, of the 3d March, 1823, entitled 'An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1823, and for other purposes ;' and, if said line has not been run, that he inform this House what instructions have been given, or measures adopted, in relation to the execution of the provisions of the law, and what causes have prevented said line from being run," I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of War, which contains the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 13, 1824.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 11th instant, requesting the President of the United States "to inform this House if the line intended to constitute the western boundary of the Territory of Arkansas, has been run, in conformity with the provisions of the third section of the act of Congress, of the 3d of March, 1823, entitled 'An act making further appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1823, and for other purposes ;' and, if said line has not been run, that he inform this House what instructions have been given, or measures adopted, in relation to the execution of the provision of the law, and what causes have prevented said line from being run," has the honor to state, that the line referred to by the resolution of the House, has not been run. Shortly after the termination of the last session of Congress, General Thomas Hinds, of Mississippi, and Mr. William Woodward, of the Arkansas Territory, were appointed Commissioners to hold a treaty with the Choctaw Indians, for the purpose of carrying into effect the provision of the act above mentioned ; and communications were addressed to them by this Department, notifying them of their appointment, and enclosing instructions for their government. The communication for General Hinds, (who was directed to make the principal arrangements for the treaty,) it appears, never reached him, owing to some failure of the mails, or other cause, unknown to this Department ; that for Mr. Woodward, was received by him, of which, however, the Department has only been apprized since the meeting of Congress. Owing to these causes, the proposed treaty with the Choctaws was not held ; and, consequently, the line, which depended on the arrangement to be made by the treaty, could not be run.

It may be proper to state, that the Choctaw nation has applied for permission to send on a deputation to Washington, (the object of which is stated to be, to treat with the Government on the subject of their lands west of the Mississippi,) which has been granted ; and it is hoped that a suitable arrangement may be made, so that the line may be run the next Summer. All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

The Message and report were ordered to lie on the table.

THIRD.

To the House of Representatives of the United States :

The House of Representatives, on the 26th ultimo, having "resolved, that the President be requested to cause to be laid before the House an estimate of the expense which would be incurred by transporting two hundred of the troops now at the Council Bluffs, to the mouth of Columbia, or Oregon river," I herewith transmit a report of the Secretary of War, which contains the information required.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR, Feb. 17, 1824.

The Secretary of War, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 26th January last, requesting the President of the United States to cause to be laid before this House "an estimate of the expense which would be incurred by transporting two hundred of the troops now at the Council Bluffs, to the mouth of the Columbia or Oregon river," has the honor to transmit, herewith, a report of the Quartermaster General, which contains the information required. Respectfully submitted.

J. C. CALHOUN.

QUARTERMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington City, Feb. 16, 1824.

SIR : In obedience to your order, dated the 30th ultimo, requiring an estimate of the probable expense of transporting two hundred of the troops, now at the Council Bluffs, on the Missouri river, to the mouth of Columbia, or Oregon river, I have the honor to report, that the expense will consist :

1st. Of an outfit of boats, and the necessary tools and materials to keep them in repair, to transport the detachment from the Council Bluffs to the head of navigation on the Missouri, or Yellow Stone river.

2. The number of horses necessary to transport the detachment, their provisions, and stores, from that place to some navigable point on the Columbia river, and tools to open a road and construct bridges on the route ; and

3. The tools and materials necessary to enable them to construct boats to descend the Columbia.

I take it for granted that the ordnance, clothing, provisions, and all the heavy baggage, required for the use of the detachment, after it shall have arrived at its destination, will be transported by sea, and that no other supplies than those actually necessary on the march, will be taken across the Rocky Mountains. If so, the whole outfit, including arms, ammunition, and provisions, for twelve months, would not exceed one hundred and forty tons ; to transport which ten boats, which, with all their equipments, would not exceed seven hundred dollars each, would be sufficient.

Fifteen hundred dollars would provide all the tools that would be required in opening a road and constructing bridges between the navigable points of the Missouri and the Columbia. And two hundred horses would be amply sufficient for the transportation over that route. These horses could be obtained from the Pawnees, near the Council Bluffs, or from the Mandans, at about thirty dollars each, in merchandise ; and, perhaps, would not cost the Government more than fifteen or twenty dollars each in cash ; at all events, not more than twenty-five dollars each.

H. OF R.

Relief of Sarah Perry.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Fifteen hundred dollars would provide all the tools and materials necessary to construct boats to descend the Columbia.

The necessary expense, then, incident to the movement, would be—

For 10 boats, at $700 each	- - -	$7,000
intrenching and other tools necessary on the march	- - -	1,500
200 horses, at $30 each, in merchandise, say $25 each	- - -	5,000
tools and materials for boats on the Columbia	- - -	1,500
Total	- - -	15,000
Add an equal sum for unforeseen expenses	- - -	15,000

And the whole amount required will be - $30,000

To transport the heavy baggage, ordnance, and a supply of provisions, by sea, whaling or sealing vessels, or northwest traders, it is believed, might be chartered at about five or six thousand dollars each; two would be sufficient, say they would cost $7,000 each; and the amount of sea transportation would be four-tenth thousand dollars, making the entire expenses of the operation, by land and water, forty-four thousand dollars.

Small as this estimate may appear when we consider the magnitude of the object proposed to be accomplished, I feel confident that, if the operations be conducted by the military, it will be more than sufficient. I have the honor to be, &c.,

TH. S. JESUP,

Brig. Gen. and Q. M. Gen.

Hon. J. C. CALHOUN, Sec'y of War.

Ordered, That the said Message and report be referred to the committee appointed on the 29th December last, to inquire into the propriety of taking possession of the Columbia or Oregon river.

FOURTH.

A Message transmitting certain documents relative to the claim of Massachusetts, for services rendered by the militia of that State in the late war, and for which payment was made by the State; which was read and laid on the table. [See Senate proceedings.]

EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED TARIFF.

The motion of Mr. OWEN, of Alabama, charging the Committee of Ways and Means with an inquiry into the effect of the Tariff Bill, being taken up, Mr. STORRS moved that it be laid on the table.

On this question the yeas and nays were taken, and stood—yeas 86, nays 94, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bailey, Barber of Connecticut, Bartlett, Beecher, Bradley, Brown, Buchanan, Cady, Campbell of Ohio, Carter, Collins, Condict, Cook, Crafts, Craig, Durfee, Dwight, Eaton, Eddy, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Ellis, Farrelly, Findlay, Forward, Garrison, Gazlay, Harris, Hemphill, Henry, Herkimer, Ingham, Jenkins, Jennings, Johnson of Virginia, J. T. Johnson, P. Johnson, Kremer, Lathrop, Lawrence, Little, McArthur, McKean, McLane of Delaware, McLean of Ohio, Mallary, Markley, Martindale, Matlack, Metcalf, Patterson of Pennsylvania, Patterson of Ohio, Plumer of Pennsylvania, Prince, Richards, Rich, Rogers, Rose, Ross, Sharpe, Sloane, Stewart, Stoddard, Storrs, Strong, Swan, Taylor, Test, Thompson of Kentucky, Tod, Tomlinson, Tracy, Trimble, Udree, Vance of Ohio, Van Wyck, Vinton, Wayne, Whitman, Whittlesey, White, James Wilson, Henry Wilson, Wood, Woods, and Wright.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Alexander of Tennessee, Allen of Tennessee, Baylies, P. P. Barbour, Bassett, Blair, Breck, Brent, Buck, Burleigh, Burton, Cambreleng, Campbell of South Carolina, Cary, Cassedy, Clark, Cocke, Conner, Crowninshield, Culpeper, Cushman, Cuthbert, Day, Dwinell, Edwards of North Carolina, Floyd, Foot of Connecticut, Foote of New York, Forsyth, Frost, Garnett, Gatlin, Gist, Govan, Gurley, Hall, Hamilton, Hayden, Hayward, Herrick, Hobart, Hogeboom, Holcombe, Hooks, Houston, Isacks, Kent, Kidder, Lee, Leftwich, Leitcher, Lincoln, Litchfield, Livingston, Long, Longfellow, McCoy, McDuffie, McKee, McKim, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Moore of Alabama, Neale, Nelson, O'Brien, Owen, Plumer of New Hampshire, Poinsett, Rankin, Reed, Reynolds, Saunders, Sandford, Sibley, Arthur Smith, William Smith, Spence, Standefer, A. Stevenson, J. Stephenson, Tucker of Virginia, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyson, Vance of North Carolina, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Webster, Wickliffe, Williams of Virginia, Williams of North Carolina, and Wilson of South Carolina.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, moved as an amendment to strike out the words "Committee of Ways and Means" and insert "Secretary of the Treasury."

On this resolution and amendment, a desultory debate arose, in which Messrs. BRENT, MALLARY, INGHAM, WEBSTER, OWEN, FORSYTH, FOOT of Connecticut, and TOD, took part—it was opposed on the ground of the present state of health of the Secretary of the Treasury; which, although it admitted of the ordinary detail of the office going on without interruption, precluded him from any exertion of the kind that would be required by the inquiry now proposed to be referred to him. And it was advocated on the ground of the Treasury Department's possessing all the requisite data in which the required report must be founded. The debate was superseded by the lapse of the time allowed for the consideration of resolutions.

RELIEF OF SARAH PERRY.

Mr. FULLER, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommitting a bill, entitled "A bill for the relief of Sarah Perry, mother of the late Oliver H. Perry," reported the bill in the same form in which it was at first brought into the House—[omitting the amendment which proposed to charge Mrs. Perry's support on the Navy Pension Fund.] The report is as follows:

Though this bill was recommitting without any definite instructions, yet, from the objections which were made to its original character, and the efforts to change it, by making the relief of Mrs. Perry a charge upon the Navy Pension Fund, the committee are led to consider the nature and expediency of the change proposed.

However strong may be the disposition of the committee to afford to the mother of the illustrious Perry the same tokens of regard which have been accorded to his widow and children, it is incumbent on them to abstain from any encroachment upon the fund in question, provided it shall appear that the faith of the Government is pledged to protect this fund, as a consecrated deposit for the support and encouragement of another and different class of persons.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

H. OF R.

By the act of the 23d of April, 1800, (Sec. 5,) it is provided, that the proceeds of all prizes taken by the public armed ships of the United States, when of inferior force, shall be adjudged one-half to the captors, and the other half to the United States. By the eighth section of the same act it is provided, that all officers, seamen, and marines, disabled in service, shall receive a pension during life, or the continuance of disability; and by the next section it is enacted, that all moneys which may accrue to the United States from prizes "shall be, and remain forever," a fund for the payment of pensions to those officers, seamen, and marines, who may be entitled to receive the same; and if the fund should be insufficient, the public faith is pledged to supply the deficiency; and should there be a surplus, it shall be applied to making further provision for the beforementioned persons, and "for such as may merit, by their bravery and long and faithful services, the gratitude of their country."

Early in the late war with Great Britain, and before the Navy Pension Fund had in any considerable degree accumulated under these provisions of law, an act was passed extending its benefits to the widows and orphan children of such officers, seamen, and marines, as might fall in battle or die of wounds, limiting their pensions to the term of five years. The wisdom and policy of this extension are very manifest; and it was no violation of the sections of the act before recited, as far as it applied to any future or prospective acquisition from prizes. The present fund has arisen from captures made almost exclusively since the extension, and it remains pledged to the purposes of the original law, with no other addition.

Should justice or policy require that any other relatives of seamen be relieved at the public expense, the committee are of opinion that the public faith does not permit it to be done from the acquisitions of the present fund; but, they have no doubt of the right of Congress to provide by law that the proceeds of prizes, which may be hereafter captured, may be applied to new objects of public bounty. But, while so many officers, seamen, and marines, remain, who may require relief, or who may be entitled, by "their bravery and faithful services," to the benefits of the fund, and who, if it were exhausted, might seek in vain the fulfilment of their country's pledge, it is deemed no less unjust than impolitic to assail this sacred deposit—the fruit of valor and of victory—the balm of honorable wounds, and the consolation of bereaved widowhood and helpless infancy.

The committee are of opinion that the bill ought to pass in its original form, and they have accordingly restored the enacting clause, and report it to the House with no other amendment or variation.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CONDUCT in the Chair,) on the bill to amend the several acts for laying duties on imports.

Mr. MARTINDALE (who had moved on Friday that the Committee rise) rose and said: At the close of the last sitting of this honorable Committee, I moved that the Committee rise before taking the question on the motion to strike out the article of cotton bagging, in order to give me an opportunity to submit to its consideration my sentiments on the general principles of the bill. I was induced to make that motion, sir, because the discussion of the general principles of the bill seemed to have been fallen into by its adversaries by a kind of common consent. Indeed, sir, it had been distinctly avowed by some honorable gentlemen in the opposition, that they might as well discuss the general principles on the motion to strike out the article under consideration, as on a motion to strike out the enacting clause; and my honorable colleague from New York has delivered a long and able argument on this motion, expressly upon the general principles of the bill, and in opposition thereto; and some friends of the bill have pursued the same course in their observations. It was my intention, sir, at the time I made the motion to rise, to have pursued the course which seemed to be thus marked out. But, sir, upon further and deliberate reflection upon the course proposed—upon an examination of the rules of the House, and upon conferring with some honorable gentleman older than myself, and better acquainted with those rules than I am, I am strongly impressed with the conviction that this course of debate is not strictly in order. What are we doing, sir? Upon this motion to strike out of this bill the article of cotton bagging, we are discussing the general principles of the bill, principles equally applicable to every article in it.

Connect with this, sir, the open avowal, emphatically made by gentlemen in the opposition, that they will fight this odious bill step by step, and inch by inch, and follow the course we are now pursuing, and the debate becomes interminable. Are there not general principles in this bill, sir? That there are general principles upon which it is opposed, is most obvious. Gentlemen say they will oppose every part of it. They will, therefore, move to strike out every part of it. And on every such motion we shall hear repeated, as we have done already, the same objections, that it will ruin trade and commerce—that it will destroy the revenue, and prostrate our Navy—that it will enhance the prices of articles of the first necessity, and thus be taxing the poor; and that it will destroy the cotton market, and stop the further growth of cotton. What shall hinder, sir, the repetition of these arguments on every motion to strike out? And the friends of the bill, too, in their replies, are driven necessarily to general topics of discussion? If this course is to be pursued, sir, the enemies of the bill need take no other way to defeat it.

Perceiving the tendency of this course, sir, the friends of the bill have frequently requested its adversaries to move to strike out the enacting clause, for the purpose of testing the general principles of the bill. This, from proper motives, no doubt, they have declined doing. Urged by these considerations, sir, to save the time of the House, to promote the progress of this bill, and prevent its defeat—for I am entirely devoted to the principles of this bill, and shall sustain them to the utmost of my feeble abilities—and to place the argument which I wish to submit to the consideration of this Committee upon its legitimate and orderly foundation, I have come to the resolution, sir, advised as I am that the motion is in order, to move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. I make you that motion, sir.

Mr. M. then commenced a speech in favor of the bill, which occupied the House till 4 o'clock, when he gave way for a motion that the Committee rise; and the Committee rose, and then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, February 24.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, from the Committee of Ways and Means, who were instructed, on the 21st of January last, "to inquire into the expediency of appropriating five thousand dollars for the use of the Library of Congress," made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill authorizing an appropriation for the use of the Library of Congress; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the whole House to which is committed the bill making appropriations for the support of Government, for the year 1824.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the consideration of the petition of sundry aliens residing in the State of New Jersey; the petition of sundry aliens in the State of Indiana; the petition of J. and A. Nattali; the petition of Pierre Berthelet and Oliver Berthelet; and the petition of a committee appointed by a meeting of the citizens of the city of New York, on behalf of the aliens residing in said city. As, also, from the consideration of the inquiry which said committee was directed to make, on the 10th of December last, whether any, and what, alterations are necessary, in the existing laws establishing rules of naturalization; and into the expediency of furnishing copies of those laws to the courts authorized to naturalize aliens; and that the several petitions and resolution be referred to the committee appointed, on the 16th instant, on the memorial of sundry aliens residing in the city of New Orleans.

Mr. RANKIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill from the Senate entitled "An act to regulate the surveying of public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama," reported the same without amendment; and it was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

Mr. SAUNDERS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to alter the times of holding the district court at Mobile, in the district of Alabama;" reported the same with an agreement to those amendments.

Mr. MOORE, of Alabama, moved a further amendment, inserting the word "Blount" immediately after the word "Morgan," in the list of counties in the northern district; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. BARTLETT, by leave of the House, presented a memorial of the merchants, ship-owners, and mechanics of Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire, representing the many evils, which, in their opinion, will flow from the passage of the bill now pending in this House to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports, and praying that said bill may not be passed into a law. Referred.

EFFECT OF THE PROPOSED TARIFF.

The resolution of Mr. OWEN being again called up, and the question being put on the amendment of Mr. SHARPE, inserting "the Secretary of the Treasury" in place of "the Committee of Ways and Means," it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 80, noes 69, and the question being on adopting the resolution as amended, the yeas and nays were called for. Before taking the yeas and nays, Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, offered a further amendment, inserting after the word "Resolved," "That the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, with directions to report," &c.

Mr. McLANE stated his reasons for offering the amendment to be, that, if the resolution were directed to that officer, it must of necessity be accompanied with the subject-matter on which he is to report.

Mr. SHARPE opposed the amendment, as calculated to embarrass the proceedings on the bill.

Mr. HAMILTON supported the amendment, as it would be a loss of time to go on with discussions on the bill, while it was referred for consideration to an officer of the House.

At the suggestion of Mr. STORRS, the resolution was so amended as not to discharge the Committee from the discussion, but to furnish the Secretary with a copy of the bill.

Mr. MANGUM, while professing his general objections to the bill, supported the amendment and resolution now offered, as a measure of fairness, tending to bring light upon the discussion.

Mr. OWEN protested against all intention of retarding the discussion, and assented to the amendment as now proposed.

The question being taken on Mr. McLANE's amendment, it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 107.

Mr. RICH offered a further amendment, to strike out the words "of the Government," and insert after "revenue" the words "the commerce and manufacturing and agricultural interests of the United States."

Mr. R. supported his amendment by a few observations, signifying that revenue was not the only interest to be considered in the legislation of Congress.

Mr. McDUFFIE opposed this amendment as imposing duties which had no reference to the official duties of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. OWEN followed on the same side, and seemed to consider the amendment as intended either to ridicule or evade the object of the resolution.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. FLOYD objected to the whole course proposed. He thought it was not consistent with the dignity of the House to go for information, and for the suggestion of its future duties, to one of the President's Secretaries; and moved to lay the resolution, with the amendment, on the table.

The yeas and nays being called for, on this question, stood—yeas 96, nays 92, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbot, Adams, Alexander of Virginia, Allen of Tennessee, Allison, Archer, Bailey, Baylies, Barber of Connecticut, P. P. THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties on imports.

Mr. MARTINDALE resumed the speech which he had yesterday commenced, on his own motion to strike out the enacting clause of the bill; which is given entire as follows:

I rise, said Mr. M., under a deep conviction of the vast importance of the principles of the bill upon your table, and my utter incompetency to a satisfactory discussion of them. But, sir, my great anxiety that those principles should finally prevail, and that they should now prevail, believing, as I do, that the condition of our country imperiously demand their adoption, and my consciousness, too, sir, that that country, on this occasion, expects that every man should do his duty, have determined me to make an attempt to overcome my extreme diffidence, and approach the discussion of this most momentous subject. It is a subject deeply interesting, sir, inasmuch as it is the commencement of a new system of policy, fraught with principles which must produce interminable and most salutary consequences, and inasmuch as it is the very first measure of the Government which looks seriously and extensively to the protection of the native productions of the country. This system, sir, is to bring into existence from our own soil, and from the labor of our own countrymen, that which would not exist without it, and in addition to that which we now produce, as a substitute for what we buy. It looks, through the medium of the mechanic and artisan, to the farmer; it can reach him no other way; it can protect him no other way. Unless I greatly mistake the character of the bill, and labor under so strong a delusion that I am led to believe a lie, it is fraught with manifold and lasting blessings to our common country. But, in the accomplishment of this great and good design, I am sensible that some existing and local interests must be temporarily and partially affected. The importing commerce of our country must be suspended, or diverted into another channel, in just so much as the home production shall become a substitute for the imported article. But, on every principle, but that of exclusive selfishness, are they not bound to give up this traffic, if it be pernicious to their country? The increased duty on cotton bagging will, for a little while, enhance the price of cotton to the consumer. Those of the North, East, and West, who produce no cotton, but consume tenfold more of the article than those who do, must, for a moment, as it were, pay this increased price; but a permanent, (and comparatively to them an important interest,) of our brethren of the West, will be promoted by it, and we make the sacrifice cheerfully. Our brethren of the West, enjoying the richest soil and the best climate in the world, are stated, and admitted to be, the poorest among all the members of this great family. That which nature designed to be the richest, through the influence of mistaken policy is the poorest; and, if that policy prevails, will be kept so. And why? They have no market. They produce their food, to be sure, but they must buy a large portion of their clothing. They have bought till they have expended their specie. A mistaken policy induced a resort to a substitute, in the form of bank paper. Experience soon proved the fatal error, in the increased extent and magnitude of the evil. All this goes to prove that the consumers of imported and purchased articles must have a market for their produce or the fruits of their labor, or accumulated distress must ensue. The West have no market and the distress has ensued. And, Mr. Chairman, do the West alone complain? And if they did, will gentlemen say it is only the West; it is not necessary to heed their complaints? Sir, who are these inhabitants of the West? They are our kindred and our friends. They are our brothers and our sisters. Many—our fathers and our mothers—who have gone with their children and our brothers, to spend the evening of their days, and to die there. They did not leave their country when they went there. It is their country and our country still; and thank God they may go still farther West, and still be within the boundaries of their country; to where the setting sun quenches his orb in the western wave, and still claim the kind concern and protecting care of our common country, and our country's common Government. The father goes to the West to visit his children, and the brother, after a long separation, to salute his brother. Go where you will, sir, through the Western States, and you find your old neighbors, your nearest relatives, and dearest friends; and while they are encountering the hardships and privations of the pioneers of our new settlements, if their situation is not calculated to awaken our sympathies, and open the hand of a liberal and protecting policy, which the close-fisted cold calculator of pence would shut, I know not what will. Mr. Chairman, in discussing this subject of somewhat conflicting interests, the feelings which these reflections are calculated to produce, should be put in requisition. If we are any of us called upon to make sacrifices, we should look and see to whom; and if we find that the sacrifice is to ourselves, or to those we love as ourselves, as we are commanded to do our neighbors, we shall make the sacrifice cheerfully, or rather, we shall deem it no sacrifice. Acrimony and angry feeling will, at all events, be subdued, and we shall come to this investigation with calmness and deliberation, and a single eye to truth and the good of our country.

But, sir, there is another principle which gentlemen seem to have lost sight of, and which I think should govern in this discussion. Our powers and our duties are reciprocal. They are co-extensive and correspondent. The interests which we can affect, those interests we represent. We are none of us at liberty to disregard the interests which every vote each one of us gives, influences more or less. We are, then, each one of us the representative of every interest, and, of course, of the whole. We are elected by minute districts, I know. This is but a mode in which the whole have agreed to elect their Representatives. But this does not change our powers and our duties when elected. They are precisely what they would have been had we been elected en masse by a general ticket of the whole United States. The power of each is to affect every interest in the whole Republic; his duty is to consult, and be governed by those interests. He must, then, look at the whole; and he must look, not to the present only, but to the future also, as far as the keen eye of the statesman can reach, and thus, from this eminence, as from a political observatory, taking a survey of the permanent, ever-during interests of the country, decide as those interests shall indicate. We must, sir, expand our views to the dimensions of our country, or, before long, our country will be contracted to correspond with the limited extent of those views. On this principle, sir, we are not at liberty to deem ourselves as the Representatives of the particular district or State where we were elected, and may reside, as the envoys of distinct and independent governments, sent here to obtain, by dint of argumentative negotiation, as much advantage, each over the other, as we can, which we are at liberty to protract or break off at pleasure; but, sir, we are the common agents of one common country, the conservators and guardians of the great interests of this great Republic. The Representative from Louisiana is bound to regard the interests of Kentucky, Ohio, and Maine, when he understands them, as much as the Representatives of those respective States, and to sacrifice a minor interest, at least, to promote their greater good. We are but one people, sir. We have but one country, a great and a good one, which our forefathers won for us, and have bequeathed to us; so far as our powers and official capacities extend, we have but one Government—the Government of this great empire, “one and indivisible.” Gentlemen talk of a Confederation—of a Confederated Government. Sir, this language is new to me. I have not read it in the Constitution. It sounds foreign in my ears, and it is foreign to my feelings, and I am confident it is foreign to the feelings of my countrymen generally. We all feel, I trust, sir, as much now as on the memorable 8th of January, 1815, that New Orleans is a part of our country; and the recollections of the hard-fought and sanguinary field of Bridgewater and Chippewa awaken the sympathies, while they gratify the pride of the inhabitants of Georgia and Louisiana. Let us be Americans, sir, and feel and act as Americans. Let us feel that we have a country, and let those feelings embrace the whole of it. Does that country stretch from Florida to the Yellow Stone, and from Maine to the Oregon? A warm and expanded patriotism can embrace this wild region, and entertain a common feeling for their remote and distant inhabitants. I know these are feelings which prevail in this country, and govern this Committee. We are tempted, occasionally, sir, in the warmth of debate, to forget these feelings, and to assume the character of sectional advocates. We will then, sometimes, sir, speak of this Government as a confederation of independent States, and about the inhabitants of such and such a State not submitting to the operation of such and such a measure. By this I presume gentlemen mean that they will remonstrate against it, and endeavor to convince this Government that they ought to repeal it. If more than this is meant; if by this gentlemen mean, “peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must,” I would remind gentlemen that there is one sacred, invariable, enduring principle of our Government, which no portion of our country can ever violate with impunity, and that is, as the majority must govern, their decision must prevail, and the minority must submit. Why, sir, as well might the county of Suffolk, upon the extreme end of Long Island, talk of rebelling against the State of New York, or determining to build a canal, in which she had no interest, but to which it is obliged to contribute, as the cotton-growing section of our country oppose the authority of this Government, because the bill on your table, if adopted, may limit, in some measure, their cotton market, and add an inconsiderable sum to the expense of its production. If they think this measure wrong, gentlemen may talk with propriety of appealing to the sovereignty of the people. They have full scope and perfect right to obtain that sovereign majesty—to do what? To secede from the Union; to dissolve this Government? No, it is impossible; but simply in a quiet, pacific, Constitutional way, to change the Administration, to dismiss their public servants, and substitute others more honest, or more intelligent, who will understand and consult their interests better.

Thus prepared, sir, as to my feelings, and the extent and nature of my duties, I come to the discussion of the general principles of the bill upon your table.

I propose to inquire, sir, if there be any evils under the pressure of which this nation suffers. Is full employment provided by the nature and distribution of our occupations for every class of community? Do none stand idle, because no man hireth them? Does not the agriculture of the country languish, and the laborer stand still, because, beyond the supply of food for his own family, his produce perishes on his hands, or his fields lie waste and fallow, and this because his accustomed market is closed against him? It does, sir. From every section of this extended country we hear complaints of poverty and individual distress. From the North, and from the East, and from the West—in all directions, sir, but from the cotton-growing sections—hundreds of petitions and memorials have reached us, pouring forth the loud voice of supplication and prayer for some measures of protection and relief. These have proceeded from the yeomanry of our country, from the industrious mechanic, from the farmer as well as from the manufacturer. And will gentlemen suppose that these complaints are feigned and causeless? Our own personal knowledge excludes the supposition. Let each member of this committee take the circuit of his district, (excepting always the highly favored commercial and cotton-growing districts,) and inquire individually of his agricultural and manufacturing constituents—Sir, are you clear of debt, and if not, have you the ready means of payment? Have you a ready market for all the surplus produce of your farm to the utmost ability of your farm to produce by the labor you can command? Do you keep as many sheep as your farm can sustain, and can you sell the wool they produce? Is your farm adapted to the culture of flax and hemp; and, if so, where can you find a market? The answers these several questions will receive, would show the accumulated and various distresses of his constituents. There is, sir, multiplied and deep distress in this country. We are not in that prosperous and happy condition that some gentlemen would feign persuade us to believe. This distress presses harder upon the farmer and manufacturer, I know, sir, than upon any other class of our fellow citizens. The reason is obvious. While the merchant was growing rich in the exchange of his importations, for the farmer's produce, during what may be termed emphatically "the golden days of commercial prosperity," the farmer was consuming these importations to the extent of his ability to purchase. He did not even then become rich. When all his produce commanded an unexampled price and a quick sale, the merchant turned the exchange more to his own advantage than to the farmer's, by paying the price of the purchase of the produce by imported articles of consumption. While this extraordinary demand for the productions of our soil continued, a corresponding activity in our agricultural pursuits was excited, and a kindly soil rewarding the labors of the farmer with abundant crops, enabled him to sustain, for the time, habits of expense and indulgence to which he had not been accustomed. But this day of unclouded prosperity was soon to be overcast. The years of plenty were soon to be succeeded by years of dearth and famine. The European markets were closed against the articles of food with which our farmers had been accustomed to supply them; and thus they were suddenly deprived of the means of satisfying an unabated demand for foreign manufactures. We suddenly discovered the defective organization of our community. We now found ourselves a nation of mere farmers and merchants; producing our own food, to be sure, but dependent on the merchant for our clothing to a vast amount, together with almost every article of domestic convenience, without the adequate means of purchasing them. Foreign nations no longer stood in need of our food; they produced a sufficiency for their own use. But we needed their manufactures, and could not supply them ourselves. This showed at once a defective distribution of the labor of the community. We were incapable of satisfying our own wants from our own resources. Clothing and domestic utensils are as necessary as food, and we can supply but one; and that one we can supply to ten times the amount of the demand.

It may be useful to take a brief retrospect of the causes and policy which have led to this result—to this imperfect organization of our population in the distribution of labor.

Necessity made our forefathers, in their first settlement on this continent, mere farmers. The forest must be felled, and the fields opened to the genial warmth of the sun, and the soil prepared for the reception of seed. Food could be produced here; but clothing and all implements of husbandry and household furniture must be brought from home. With a clear-sightedness which has always distinguished the English merchant, in providing for his own interest, the English nation and Government saw at once a new source of employment and profit in this new intercourse. Her own trade and manufactures would eventually be powerfully sustained by the young colonies. In due time, as they advanced in population, and expanded in extent, and manifested a disposition to fabricate for themselves some articles of the first necessity and the simplest workmanship, England interposed the authority of her laws to stop the process; and this interdiction of our fathers' manufactures constituted a prominent part of the bill of grievances and complaints which was so repeatedly presented to the British Parliament, and laid before the English throne. Our great Franklin, sir, in embodying some general principles of pacification between the colonies and the mother country, immediately preceding the Revolution, which were to be submitted to some agents of the British Ministry, insisted, among other things, upon abolishing these restrictions upon our manufactures. But he was told that this system of restriction was a favorite idea with the Ministry, and could not be abandoned. We have reason to thank God, sir, that England had not then become as wise as experience has now made her; that she had not then discovered that the best way to secure from competition a market for her manufactures, was to keep it always full; and if she saw a manufacturing establishment rising any where, to smother it by a mass of manufactures of the same kind around it. She had not then discovered that the best way to bind a sturdy and stubborn victim, was not to coerce and drive, but to administer an opiate, and then exhaust, by bleeding. Had she known then as much as she does now, it is much to be feared, that even the virtues of our fathers would not have been proof against her subtleties. But, through her blindness, and those virtues, under the Cloud and the Pillar of Fire, our fathers entered the promised land of freedom. They have left us a rich inheritance, and sealed their testament with their blood. But, sir, the close of the Revolution found us what the policy of England had made us—a nation of farmers and merchants, destitute of all but the simple, plain household manufactures. Our merchants were congregated in the seaports, upon the seaboard, and our farmers thinly scattered over a wide expanse of country, habitually looking to the seaports for a supply of such things as they needed, and could not make. The Revolution threw all our commerce into the hands of the merchants, and the force of habit and immediate interest, induced them to seize, with avidity, the golden prize. Without regard to policy at all, we immediately pursued the path marked out for us by England, and took up the business from which we had just driven her, and eagerly imported her manufactures. Our Government, too, anxious to follow English precedent, resorted at once to this importation, as a source of revenue. Thus far we had gained the inestimable privilege of governing ourselves, to be sure, and of taxing, for our own use, to a tenfold amount, what England had designed for hers; but the commercial system which England had adopted, to make us tributary to her wealth, we still practised. We bought her manufactures, consumed them, and were comfortable; but did not become rich.

But England's wealth increased. All the evils and defects of our system had not had time to develop themselves, before an event occurred, which seemed to make our errors appear the better reason; and, at all events, served to conceal, during its exhibition, the tendency of our policy, or rather want of policy. A twenty years' war in Europe, which drew into the vortex all its various nations, made our merchants the carriers of a large portion of the world, and our farmers the feeders of immense belligerent armies. An unexampled activity and increase in our commerce followed—our agriculture extended itself, grew, and flourished. An unprecedented demand gave the farmer an extraordinary price for his produce, and authorized, as he supposed, the indulgence of habits of unusual expense. During the operation of these causes, imports kept pace with exports, and consumption with both; and, though the nation grew and expanded on all sides, it was a subject of wonder that the country did not become rich. If any wealth was retained in our own country, it was collected in our cities and in the hands of our merchants, who, as the common agents of both producer and consumer, in exchanging their respective commodities, had managed to keep a comfortable profit in their own hands, with which they not only sustained themselves in a princely style of living, and set pernicious examples of expensive extravagance to the community, which all were swift to follow, but they built houses, and enlarged our cities to a size immensely disproportioned to the population of our country, and multiplied their ships, also, as the vehicles of exportation of our produce and importation of articles of luxury and consumption. To vend these, country merchants' stores were suddenly erected in every nook and corner, at every turn of every road, and thickly crowded in all our villages. The farmer even converted his parlor into a merchant's store, and dismissed his son from following the plough, to waiting on his customers behind the counter. The "mercantile business," as it was called, was perceived to be the road to wealth, and at once to furnish the means of comparative ease and genteel living. It became a most desirable thing to exchange the rough and humble habits and coarse living of the farmer for the comely, the genteel, and tasteful life of the merchant. The rush was simultaneous, I believe, throughout the country. Few had the steadiness to resist this delirium; our Government caught, in common, the giddy spirit of the day, and stood rejoicing at the rich display of foreign fabrics, and the thoughtless eagerness with which the people purchased them—our Treasury was filled, and their constituents did not know they were taxed. This tendency to commercial pursuits became, what may be termed, emphatically a rage. It was commercial madness and infatuation; and, even while the means of indulgence were furnished by an extraordinary foreign demand for our produce, numerous cases of aggravated individual distress were produced. In the mean time, commercial wants, commercial cupidity, and commercial skill, devised a scheme auxiliary to their system of traffic and exchange, which would facilitate their operation, and more than quadruple their means. Banks were generally introduced, and almost infinitely multiplied. These are creatures which I so heartily detest, that I can hardly find language to characterize them. They are the engines of legalized fraud upon the community—they are an authority to coin a fictitious, unsolid, unreal, spurious currency, as a substitute for the real and legitimate; by which means the legitimate is drawn from circulation, and, in pursuance of our commercial system, sent abroad to buy articles of consumption. They are the medium by which the solid coin and substantial property of the farmer has been, and is obtained for nothing, nay, worse than nothing; for a promise which cannot be performed, is worse than nothing. Will it be said that this is unjustly severe? Let these promises, in the shape of bank bills, be enforced at once, and who will say that they can be performed—that they will not be broken to the amount of many millions? They have been broken to the amount of many millions already, and so far operated as a sudden unexpected tax upon the unfortunate community, where this shadowy, unreal, airy image of the bank, in the shape of a fanciful figure, called credit, stood, and the vision having vanished into thin air, the community found themselves unexpectedly overwhelmed in broad and deep distress. These banks, sir, add nothing to the wealth of a country—not one cent. They are mere promises, false and hollow all. They serve the makers, the stockholders I mean, for cash, so long as they are not enforced. But the deception is practised in the issuing. They are exchanged at once for the solid valuable property of the farmer, and the merchant acquires what the farmer loses, and the merchant is so far enriched. If the bubble bursts in the farmer's hands, the farmer feels the loss; if it goes into circulation, the wound is inflicted wherever it explodes. It would be a curious fact, and one which I think Government should know, the excess of bills in circulation over the deposits of specie in the vaults. In just so much is our seeming prosperity unreal. To nearly that amount, in addition to what we owe, have we consumed beyond our means. To nearly that amount has specie been exported from the country, which would otherwise have remained here. In just so much the cities owe the country, and have drained the country of solid wealth, and amassed it in our cities. Money is the representative of property, but bank bills are the shadow of that representative; adopt the shadow, and the substance is gone. I should not have been led to remark upon this subject, but for the powerful aid banks have afforded commerce in the great process of depletion, which has terminated almost in the debility of exhaustion. They have contributed to blind the nation to its real situation, and to build up, at the expense of the country, a splendid commercial establishment, and have conspired at the same time with that commerce, to encourage and fix our extravagant and expensive habits, which have finally paralyzed our industry, exhausted our resources, and left us deeply in debt.

While the years of plenty continued, it was orthodox to believe, and many still believe, that banks were a fruitful source of blessings to the country, and served to display our commerce in the golden beams of wealth and glory. But, the day of commercial joy and rejoicing was soon to be succeeded by a day of seriousness and sober repentance. A day of retribution was preparing for a thoughtless people and a thoughtless Government. But the process of correction was gentle and merciful. It carried blessings along with it. Interruptions to our carrying trade, by conflicting belligerent orders, and the ensuing commercial embarrassments, checked a little the flood of importations, and the exportation of our means of living and defence. These were followed by our own embargoes, which reduced still more the mass of importations, and restrained our exports. Individual and national distress ensued, I know; but it was salutary, and prepared us, step by step, and by slow degrees, for the event which followed. Peace came in Europe, and shut out our exports, and found us in war with England, which almost cut off our imports. The shock was violent, and, had we not been armed by a little preparatory suffering, might have been fatal. Now we felt the defective organization of our system. Now we saw the imperfect distribution and classification of labor. We now experienced the blessed effects of permitting trade to regulate itself; that is, of permitting merchants to regulate every thing. We now felt how comfortable it was to have plenty of food, but no clothing; and we were satisfied that it would have been quite as wise to have detached a portion of our labor from the pursuits of agriculture, and put it to the cloth-making business, and other branches of manufactures. But suddenly, and as if by magic, manufacturing establishments arose all over the country, and the native skill, energy, and enterprise of our citizens were never more conspicuously displayed than by the sudden and unexpected supply of various manufactured articles, to nearly the extent of our wants. Flocks of sheep were quickly multiplied and enlarged, and a tolerable supply of wool was furnished. The farmer found a new branch of industry pointed out to him, requiring less labor, and producing more profit. His accustomed productions for food found a new market, a ready sale, and a liberal price. The farmer's prosperity was really greater than it had been in the days of commercial prosperity. His expenses were retrenched and his profits increased, and he began to emerge from debt. Could the war have been continued, unattended by any consequence but that of shutting out foreign importations, it would have been a national blessing compared with the consequences which followed its conclusion. The experience of three years was thrown away upon our Government; the wisdom which the war was calculated to teach seemed to be lost in exultation at its glorious termination. Our ports were opened to the overwhelming inundations of foreign goods, and our own merchants vied with our recent enemies in the extraordinary activity with which they swelled the tide of importation. They now engaged in (to us) the unprofitable contest, not of seeing which could do each other the most harm, but which could contribute most to the ruin of our country. These efforts were most successful. In one short year, a supply of foreign goods for several, were crowded into our markets, cheap as dirt, of a handsome exterior and specious finish. By the machinery of auction sales, these goods were driven into the country for such price as they would fetch; and a cordon of merchants' stores, at convenient distances, and remarkably near each other, were immediately replenished to overflowing with these fresh goods, on every road leading from our commercial depots to the most extreme verge of our country.

The European ports remained closed against our provisions. Our produce, then, could not be received in exchange for these goods. But our merchants very kindly offered to sell them to us on a credit of six, nine, or twelve months, to give us time to turn ourselves, as the phrase is, and pay the cash. Thus these country stores operated as secretory vessels, or glands, for the collection of the small and minute particles of wealth in the country; and, when collected in sufficient quantities, it was hastened away—to New York, for instance, a kind of common-reservoir of the wealth of that section of country; from whence, in due time, and through various channels, and by various means, it finds its way to England, the great reservoir of the wealth of nations, and in comparison with which, New York is but a country merchant's store. Our manufacturing establishments were as suddenly consumed as though they had been smitten by the bolt of Heaven. The manufacturers were turned adrift to seek a scanty subsistence by such employments as they could casually find, and to relieve themselves from the pressure of debts by our numerous insolvent laws. The farmer's wool remained on hand for want of a market, and his flocks of sheep became mere cumberers of his ground. Thousands were killed by him, and, after trying up the carcass for tallow, the offals and scraps were fed out to his hogs. While this process of waste and devastation was going on, the provision market was depressed also. There was little demand for the farmer's provisions—for his beef, pork, and wheat. The price was greatly reduced. But the habits of the farmer and his family were formed and suited to better times; the customs, taste, and fashions, of the country and his immediate neighbors, imposed a kind of moral necessity upon him to measure his expenses by theirs, not by his means. His expenses were greater than his income. The consequences were inevitable. His cash was first exhausted, and next the produce of his farm, his credit next, and (by a mortgage) next the farm itself. The expenses which produced the mortgage prevent the redemption; the farm is sold to pay for foreign goods, and the merchant becomes the purchaser. This is no unreal picture, which has no original in nature. I have myself drawn it from what I have seen and know, and many honorable gentlemen, I presume, will recognise in this a resemblance to scenes which they themselves have witnessed. A rigid economy and a stoical indifference to fashion might, perhaps, supply enough of discretion to prevent these evils:

But who is proof against the force of fashion, and who so hardy as to resist her laws? These laws are enacted by chambers of commerce. Our fashions are all commercial, of foreign importation, and of recent adoption. Within my memory, we are not the same people. Our customs, habits, dress, and mode of living, are entirely changed, from the plain agricultural simplicity of our fathers to commercial elegance and extravagance.

In addition to this commercial fashion, some other things have conspired to ruin the farmer, and the farming interest, growing out of our over-trading character. From the frequent failure of country merchants, who had entered into trade without experience or capital, and the heavy losses incurred thereby, the city merchants became wise and cautious, and when they found a country merchant begin to grow slack and fail in punctual payment, he was and is required to give his note, payable at the bank, endorsed by some of his country friends; and, as farmers are generally in good credit to something like the value of their farms, they were generally preferred for endorsers. At all events, the instances are numerous in which the farmer has been invited to lend his credit to his trading neighbor; and, being habitually confiding, honest himself, and not doubting that a merchant must be so, a request of this kind has seldom been refused. In many thousand instances, perhaps, in many I know, the failure of the merchant has produced multiplied distress and widespread ruin to the farmer, and to many farmers. The loss of money and the loss of farms have been the result. Here, too, the money and the farms have gone to pay for foreign goods. They have been brought into the country, sold, and consumed. This is one item in the excess of consumption over the ability to purchase and pay, and is one among the numerous expedients of commercial ingenuity to drain the country, and draw all things to the centre. Banks, we have seen, have the same tendency; and when they fail, as they frequently do, the loss to the amount of thousands, and sometimes millions, falls heavy on the farming interest, drawing ruin after it. Thus the farming interest has been severely taxed by trading with merchants, and through the medium of merchants' banks. They have sustained heavy losses by the failure of merchants, by becoming securities for merchants, and by the failure of merchants' banks. These, connected with the extravagant fashions, and expensive habits of living, introduced by the pernicious examples of the merchant, have well nigh ruined the farming interest, and sunk it in deep distress. All these are so many ways and means by which the fruits of the toil and industry of the country have been taken from agriculture and concentrated in our cities. This is surely wrong. This is an unhealthy action. In the economy of animal life, a healthy action tends to the surface. Change the direction, and the animal dies. Thus the body politic of this great community has become diseased. Exhaustion, debility, and decay, are visible in the extremes. We are in no condition to supply more than half our own wants, I undertake to declare, and, so far as my personal knowledge extends, can prove, that individual distress in the farming and manufacturing interest was never so multiform and great as it is now. There is one exception—the cotton growers and cotton manufacturers. They are protected, and have a market.

But, say the gentlemen, "let trade regulate itself; if there be an evil it will cure itself. Let the merchant regulate trade, he will cure the evil." He will cure the evil as death cures disease. Nothing but perfect exhaustion and motionless debility will stop the career of the merchant, and then of what use is a remedy? When gentlemen speak in this way they forget the well known principles of human nature; the force of habit, the strength of fashion, the selfishness of present interest in some, and, as to agriculture and manufactures, the necessity of a market. And what power on earth can make this market but Government? Our merchants will not make it; for then they must stop trade. They will not become manufacturers, for that would injure trade; and there is no market. They will not lend their capital to manufacturers, for that would injure trade. They will not set examples of frugality and economy to the nation, for that would injure trade. But suppose our own merchants were patriotic enough to sacrifice some present interest on the altar of their country's good. Could they effect any thing without the aid of Government? They would sacrifice themselves, but not cure the evil. England has her merchants here already. They crowd our seaports. They compete with our own merchants in swelling the flood of importations and forcing their merchandise into the country. Let our merchants retire, and their places would be instantly filled with English merchants through every section of our country. You find them now, in the shape of pedlars, traversing the country in all directions, vending English silks, English cambrics, and English cottons. It does not comport with the policy of England to permit any of our markets to become empty; nor of our own merchants neither.

It is most obvious, then, that, until Government shall interpose efficiently, we shall continue as we have done to trade and to buy; to import and consume. It encourages commerce, and we must buy; it fills the Treasury, and we must buy; it sustains the Navy, and we must buy; it makes a market for cotton, and we must buy. And now, sir, to see the effect of this upon the farmer, let us see for a moment what we buy. We buy foreign earth, in the shape of Swedish and Russian ore; we hire the Russian boor to dig and smelt it, and the Russian farmer to feed him during these operations; while our own mountains contain an exhaustless supply of iron; we have the laborers to dig it and shape it to our use, who are now poor and idle for the want of employment; and a host of farmers whose coffers would be replenished by feeding and clothing these miners and artisans during their labors. Again, we buy English wool of the English farmer, hire the English manufacturer to work it into cloth; and the English farmers to feed him. Thus, every yard of English broadcloth contains in it more or less of English wool, English beef and pork, and English bread stuffs.

This drives from our own markets just so much of our own farmers' produce, of the same kind, and from employment, also, our own mechanics and machinery, to the same amount; and this amount is immense. Can any one shut his eyes to the paralyzing, deadly consequences of this system to our farmers? Mr. Chairman, the question is not whether we shall have these manufactures or not. We must have them. They are necessary to our habits, our convenience, and comfort. The question is not whether we shall have mechanics and artisans, or not; that is, whether we shall employ them or not. We must employ them. We do employ them. We employ more than any other nation on earth, of the same wealth and population; and we consume more of their fabrics than any other nation on earth, of the same wealth and population. But the question is, sir, where shall we keep our mechanics? Who shall enjoy the profit of feeding and clothing them, and furnishing them with the wool, the iron, the hemp, and the flax, which they work up, and we buy and consume? "The English," say the merchants, and cotton planters. It is best to buy these things of the English and the Russian. It will be of no use to your farmers to furnish these things; they can be employed in clearing land, or something else. Besides, we can buy cheaper of England and Russia than we can at home, and they will take cotton in payment, and we can sell more cotton; the transportation will encourage trade; commerce will be sustained, and our Treasury filled. Ah! here lies the mystery of this contention. Here is the explanation of our opposite views. It is employment, after all, that we are all in search of. It is a market for our labor and our produce, which we all want, and all contend for. "Buy foreign goods, that we may import," say the merchants; it will make a market for importations, and find employment for our ships. Buy English manufactures, say the cotton planters; England will take our cotton in exchange. Thus, the merchant and the cotton planter fully appreciate the value of a market when they find their own encroached upon. The farmer and manufacturer claim to participate in the benefits of a market for their labor and produce; and hence this protracted debate and struggle of contending interests. It is a contest for a market between the cotton grower and merchant on one side, and the farmer and manufacturer on the other. That the manufacturer would furnish this market to the farmer, admits no doubt. The farmer should reciprocate the favor, and Government is now called upon to render this market less accessible to foreign fabrics for the mutual benefit of both. By the establishment of manufactures, machinery is extensively introduced and put in operation. Machinery is the means by which labor multiplies itself an hundred fold, or more. The old, the feeble, and infirm, may direct its operations, and the young may feed it with the raw material. Whereas the stout and athletic alone can successfully engage in agriculture. They furnish employment to a very numerous class, who could not be employed without them, and who now, in fact, find none. It has been said that machines eat nothing, and from this it has been insisted that their introduction does not assist the farmer. They eat, no food, indeed, but they eat, or rather consume, what is quite as important to the farmer—his wool, his flax, and his hemp, and that in a ratio an hundred fold increased. This consumption makes a market for these articles, a large and liberal market, which we seek to secure to ourselves against an almost exclusive occupation by the British. This machinery is what our necessities require. We need labor, sir. In this thinly populated country, labor is what we want; not for the production of food—of that we have already more than we can consume or sell—but for the supply of the other half or three-fourths of our wants—our clothing, and necessary implements of trade, of husbandry, and domestic use. By putting machinery in motion, you create, as it were, at once an hundred men, whom you set at work, instead of one; who perform an hundred times more than that one possibly could. This is precisely what our circumstances require. England, in the extensive use of machinery, has multiplied her power an hundred times in the acquisition of wealth, and in the same proportion has an advantage over us.

This, then, is the remedy we propose, sir, for the evils which we suffer. Place the mechanic by the side of the farmer, that the manufacturer who makes our cloth should make it from our farmers' wool, flax, hemp, &c., and be fed by our farmers' provisions. Draw forth our iron from our own mountains, and we shall not drain our country in the purchase of the foreign. It is most evident that, if we import wool and iron, we drive just so much of our own iron and wool from our own markets, and it ceases to be produced. We should keep our mechanics and manufacturers here, instead of England, France, or Russia; and, I may say, (what would seem paradoxical,) we should keep our farmers here, too, instead of in England, France, or Russia. How many farmers do we employ in those countries, sir, tilling their ground, growing their wool, flax, and hemp? Many thousands, sir, who grow rich at our expense, and take the bread from the mouths of our own farmers, by taking away their employment, in taking away their market.

We propose, sir, to supply our own wants, from our own resources, by the means which God and nature have placed in our hands. By the application of our own powers, our own labor, to our own capabilities, the productive powers of our own soil, and our own mines.

England has long understood and practised this policy. For many hundred years she has acted upon this policy. She has bought nothing she could make or produce, nor permitted her people to do so. But she has always had something; and now has an immense quantity of almost every thing to sell. By a steady prosecution of this policy, for centuries, she has become the most powerful and wealthy nation of the world. Her merchants and manufacturers, and her farmers, too, are the princes and nobles of the earth. How came she so rich? Her wealth has not all sprung up there. Through the medium of her agriculture and manufactures, she has made all the nations of this globe tributary to her; and no nation has subserved her purposes so steadily and perseveringly as we have.

Suppose England had pursued our policy, and instead of manufacturing for herself and the world, had bought of Holland and France, and devoted herself exclusively to agriculture and commerce. Will any gentleman contend that she would have been half so powerful and rich? But, why should she not? She has a fine soil and climate, wonderfully adapted to agriculture, superior to ours, in many respects. She has, at this moment, a large quantity of land uncultivated, superior to much that we cultivate. If we should pursue our present system, why should not England have done so? Because, to supply three-fourths of our wants by buying, is not the way for a nation to become rich. She should sell what she can: buy only what she must.

Spain, on the contrary, furnishes a good practical exposition of the blessed consequences of our system. For nearly four centuries, she has commanded the silver and the gold of Mexico and Peru. The rich treasures of Potosi have been poured, with a liberal profusion, into her lap. But, has she grown rich? No. She became able to buy. It was easy to satisfy her wants by purchase; her gold and her silver went through her, simply as a highway, as a medium of passage, and tarried not until it found a resting place in England. England furnished the manufactures, and Spain the silver and gold in exchange. England wrought, and was diligent. Spain purchased, and was idle. England grew wealthy, and Spain grew poor. Her population declined, her industry languished, and her commerce and agriculture were paralyzed. We, too, buy, and are idle. We, too, buy, and are poor. Our agriculture languishes, and our commerce is on the decline.

But, sir, we need not look abroad for examples to prove our doctrine. We have them, on a smaller scale, to be sure, at home. New England, sir, is a partial exception to our general policy. She has recently become extensively manufacturing; more so than any other section of our country. She has become, and is, comparatively, rich. In her intercourse with the other States, the rate of exchange is in her favor. This is another practical proof of the superior wealth growing out of the suitable distribution of labor among the various employments necessary to the comfort and convenience of civilized man, in the same community; and the great acquisition of power, in the application of machinery. The Societies of Shakers, sir, in our country, furnish another example in favor of our doctrine. These, sir, are small commonwealths within themselves. They are their own farmers, their own mechanics, and their own merchants. Their agriculture and their manufactures are their leading interests, as they should be every where. Their merchants are subservient to those interests, and are employed in selling their surplus produce and manufactures, and purchasing, in exchange, such things as they cannot produce or make, and are indispensable. By prosecuting this system, they have become rich. No societies or communities, in our country, of the same extent, are equally independent.

The wealth of a nation is produced by the application of its labor to its physical means, for the supply of its own wants; in the resources of its soil, its mines, its labor, its ingenuity, and skill, it will find competency and independence. In the proper application of labor to our soil, we grow wheat. In the same application of our labor, in a fit and suitable way, we produce wool, hemp, flax, and cotton. In the application of the same labor to a subject equally within our reach, we had an abundant supply of iron. It is as absurd for us to buy the iron, as it would be to buy the wheat, when inexhaustible supplies of both lie dormant in our mountains and our soil, and need but the labor and industry of man to call them forth, and fit them for his use. It is better for us, sir, to have our iron where it is, embowelled in the earth, than to have it thrown, already wrought, gratuitously upon our seaboard. For then, our wants would be supplied without exertion; and the very process of separating the iron from the ore, and digging it from the earth, employs a multitude of hands, who will enrich the farmer by consuming his produce. It is the business of a wise Government to find employment for labor. It would seem that there could be no doubt as to the soundness of this doctrine. Theory and practice concur to prove it sound. The experience of all nations who have adopted it, has proved it sound. There is not a nation on the face of this earth, that has not become rich, by its adoption. There is not a nation on this terraqueous globe, that has become rich without it. But, here we are met by a list of formidable objections. We shall ruin our commerce. Sir, I am as much the friend of commerce, as those who thus claim to defend it. But it is in its legitimate office that I will support it; not to control and swallow up all other interests. What is commerce, sir? It is the exchange between the producer and consumer; and merchants are the agents of that exchange. They are the common agents of both producer and consumer, who make a comfortable profit upon the articles while passing through their hands. They add nothing to the value of the commodity, not one cent. They live upon the exchange of the fruits of others' labors. The agent, sir, should never assume to control the interests of his principal. He should be subservient to them. Who are these producers and consumers in our country, to whom our merchants should be subservient? They are our farmers and our mechanics. The merchant has no right to say to them, buy, that I may import and sell; but the farmer and mechanic, as the principals of this common agent, have a right to say, suit your business to our wants; take the surplus of our produce and our labor, seek out a market for it, and bring us, in return, that which we need, and what we cannot make; but nothing to displace or supplant the fruits of our soil and our labor. Commerce is profitable only as it subserves the two great producing interests, agriculture and manufactures. So far as it interferes with them, it is pernicious. It paralyzes labor, by holding out inducements to buy what our labor might produce; and it exhausts our resources, by tempting us to buy more than we can afford, or have the power to pay for. Sir, we ought not to deceive ourselves; we ought not to withhold from the nation our conviction, that our commerce is overgrown. It is out of all proportion with our population and our wealth. We have more commerce than we can support; we have more merchants than we can support; probably four times the number that we need.

Look at our tonnage, sir, next in amount to that of the most commercial nation in the world, and approximating nearly to it; compare our tonnage with the population whose interests it should subserve. With a population of about ten millions, thinly scattered over a vast extent of country, with a considerable portion of it beyond the reach of commercial benefits, we have a tonnage nearly equal to that of England, with a population, including her dependencies in the East and West Indies, amounting to seventy or an hundred millions. France, with a population of more than thirty millions, has less tonnage than we. Can we sustain this immense commerce? How can we do it? Impoverish the farmer by taking away his market. Sir, this immense visionary fabric cannot be sustained. Our commerce has declined. Its decline will be accelerated. An impoverished yeomanry cannot maintain commerce. Where the farmer is poor, the merchant cannot become rich. The farmer is the substratum of society. There must be a foundation to build the superstructure on. This foundation is the farmers and mechanics' wealth. Take that away, and your commerce perishes. You have taken much of it away, sir, and your commerce is perishing. If we are correct, sir, as to the sources of our national wealth, and in the principle that commerce should look to that wealth as the only legitimate support of its permanent prosperity, then it should adapt itself, at once, to our circumstances and our wants. It would then "grow with our growth, and strengthen with our strength." Its structure would then rest on a sure foundation, and be as imperishable as our freedom and our nation. The tendency of this bill, then, will be to sustain and invigorate commerce. It will divert some portion of it into new channels, I know. But those channels will be deepened and extended. They have been so already, by a very partial adoption of our system. Our coasting trade has been greatly increased by the cotton manufactures of New England. Adopt this bill, sir, and it will soon be trebled. Our manufactures will furnish more valuable cargoes for exportation. Already have they found their way to foreign markets, and there enter into successful competition with the English. This competition will be prosecuted with still greater success. The world, sir, is as wide for us as for England; the best markets are as accessible to us as to her; and our merchants have the skill and enterprise to seek them out. We have the advantage of them, sir. We furnish for ourselves our own best market; and it is a part of our duty, directed by our wisdom, to secure to ourselves its benefits.

But there is another objection. It is contended that the principles of the bill will administer the seeds of death to our Navy; and we are invited to behave with suitable solemnity while attending its funeral. What, sir, shall we destroy our Navy—the two-edged sword of the nation; the right arm of the national defence; the winged messenger of our vengeance, and of our mercy too; our Navy, the preservation and glory of which every American identifies with his own existence! There is something in this admonition which is calculated to startle and alarm; and if these portentous consequences were not deemed unreal, the friends of this bill would hesitate, pause, and retrace their steps, and not pursue a course terminating in so fatal a catastrophe. What, sir! this bill destroy our Navy! Impossible! How is a navy sustained, sir? By the wealth of the nation. By the treasures of the Government. Impoverish the nation, and a navy cannot exist. It is a most expensive establishment. A poor nation cannot sustain a navy.

If we are mistaken as to the tendency of the system we advocate, we shall injure the Navy. If, on the contrary, it will increase the wealth of the nation, in just so much it will increase our ability to support a navy. We have timber, and iron, and hemp, for the construction and arming our ships, and carpenters to prepare and fit them for their proper use; make the nation rich, sir, give us money, and the object will be speedily accomplished. But, say gentlemen, when commerce is gone, where will you obtain your seamen? Gentlemen talk as if commerce would no more have an existence; as though exportations and importations would cease; our fishermen would be driven from the ocean, and our coasting trade annihilated. Not so. I apprehend, from this bill, but little, very little diminution of our commerce; and that diminution will be but temporary. It will greatly increase our coasting trade. It will invigorate and protect our whale fishery—our best nursery of seamen; and our exporting commerce will be extended and enlarged. Give us money, sir, and we can obtain seamen. They can be drawn from all countries. Should this bill, from this moment, exclude every article intended to be protected by it, and to be made and produced at home, still we should be able to obtain seamen enough to man our fleets, to perform the seaman's part. Landsmen, in the amphibious character of marines, on more than one occasion, have fought on board your ships, and won your victories. And this can be done again. On examination, then, the objection, though formidable in size, and plausible in appearance, is found unreal. It is vox et proterea nihil.

But here is another objection: Our revenue. And what will become of our revenue? Where shall we obtain our revenue?

On this subject, Mr. Chairman, there must be some strong delusion, some strange mistake between the friends and opponents of this bill. Who pays the tax now, sir? The consumer. From what source is your revenue drawn? From the people of these United States. The merchant takes care, he never forgets to add the duty to the price of purchase, the cost of freight, and a comfortable profit on the whole. The consumer pays the whole. The farmer, sir, our own farmers, in supporting our own revenue, not only pays this tax, which goes into the Treasury, but he pays the European farmer for the wool he grows, and the European mechanic for the labor bestowed upon it. In every yard of cloth on which he pays this tax, in almost every article we buy, is wrapt up more or less of English beef, pork, flour, provisions of every kind, which have sustained the mechanic and the farmer while growing the raw material, and fitting it for market. Now, sir, the only question on this subject is, Can the consumer pay the purchase of all this, the freight, the duty, the profit, and contingent charges, easier than he can pay the duty alone? The purchase is unnecessary; the freight is unnecessary; the merchant's profit is unnecessary; all these can be dispensed with. The article can be made at home. The tax, in the shape of duty, must be paid; and the only question is, whether it be easier to pay the tax alone, or to pay that and four times the amount with it?

Mr. Chairman, I know that importations are a legitimate source of revenue. It is the readiest, easiest, and perhaps the cheapest, mode of taxation. When importations are necessary to supply our wants, and subserve our interests, they are the proper subjects of taxation. But, I protest against that policy of our Government which would create or continue that necessity for the purposes of revenue. What is the argument? Buy, that we may tax. Buy the article of a foreign nation, as a kind of vehicle, as physicians call it, to cover up and render palatable this nauseous pill of taxation. Buy, to deceive yourselves, and that we may deceive you. I protest against that system of revenue which, to put twenty-five or thirty dollars into our own Treasury, would place a hundred at the disposition of a foreign Power; which, to fill our own Treasury, would exhaust the nation and enrich a stranger. This we do now. This is our process now. I would stop this process. Its operation on the Government and country I have attempted to show. And here the question again recurs as to its operation upon the citizen. Is it easier to pay the thirty dollars into the Treasury alone, or, in paying that, to pay the one hundred dollars, in addition, to a foreign nation? So much as the purchase of the article amounts to, goes out of the country, not in the produce of the soil, but in cash, and stock, and public securities. It cannot, surely, be a good system which would drain the country of its resources to fill its Treasury. This, too, is a portion of our draining system. But gentlemen say, unless you resort to this system, you can have no revenue. The people of my district will not submit to direct taxation.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Sir, have we sworn to support the Constitution of the United States? Is that sacred instrument equally obligatory upon all? Is the power to lay and collect taxes a part of that Constitution? And are we to be told here, on this floor, by honorable members of this House, (for it is here that I hear this language,) that the people of this country will not endure to be taxed by this Government? Then what becomes of this Government? Where is the authority of your Government? Where is your boasted Constitution, and where the virtues of this people? Sir, I deny this doctrine. I protest against this drawing of the character of this nation. I say that, when direct taxation becomes necessary, the people of this country will cheerfully submit to it. They pay the taxes now. They know they pay the taxes. And who shall judge of this necessity? The people. If we disobey their will, the people have the corrective, and know how to apply it. They can dismiss one set of servants, and substitute another. I have no apprehension, sir, that the principles of this bill will induce the necessity of direct taxation; but I feel myself authorized to say that the people whom I have the honor to represent would prefer excise and taxation to our present system. They would prefer direct taxation, with the benefits of a market for their produce, to indirect taxation, to the same amount, without a market for their surplus. If they must pay a tax, they will not quarrel about the form. But the benefits of a market are of vast importance to them. What nation, sir, was ever impoverished by moderate taxation, when the fruits of it are expended at home? This should be the policy of our expenditure. Thus exercised, taxation is a medium of collecting from the affluent and rich, and distributing among the laborious, the active, and the poor. Has this been the system of our Government? No. Year after year we have purchased, with our public revenue, the wool, the flax, and the hemp of foreign nations, their munitions of war, clothing for our troops, and canvass for our ships. This is another portion of our draining system. But, sir, a moderate application of the power of taxation, with a judicious distribution of its fruits within the limits of the nation, is invigorating and benign. It is time, sir, that the doctrine should be controverted, that the people will not bear taxation. I will never believe it. The idea supposes rebellion, insurrection, treason. And against whom? Against themselves. Not against a foreign government; nor against a government over whom they have no control; but against one created by themselves, administered by themselves, and the administration of which they may change at pleasure. To talk of opposition to such a Government, in any other way than the Constitutional one, implies a madness and infatuation equal to that which terminates in suicide—a crime never committed but in a paroxysm, of delirium, or the fatuity of dementia.

But here is a question of sectional interest, which elicits unfriendly feelings and determined hostility to the bill. I deprecate the necessity of awakening these local jealousies. I regret exceedingly, that, on a question of such vital importance, and so necessary to the permanent welfare of our country, any portion of our fellow-citizens should find occasion to feel themselves injured, so as to prevent a cordial and unanimous co-operation in this, the only step of internal national policy which has ever been taken.

But so it is. The cotton, rice, tobacco, and indigo growers, of the Southern States, claim to be deeply affected and injured by the operation of this system. These complaints claim and merit serious and candid consideration, and should be obviated if possible. I cannot endure to lose friends whom I value so highly as our fellow-citizens of the South, who are growers of cotton, tobacco, &c. Let us examine the subject a little, and see if these complaints are well founded. And, first, let us inquire if the Southern planter does not demand what, in fact, he denies to others. And now, what does he require? That the North and West should buy—what? not their cotton, tobacco, &c., for that we do already, to the utmost of our ability to consume, or pay, or vend to others; and that is to an immense amount, greatly exceeding what they purchase of us. But they insist that we should buy English wool, wrought into cloth—that they may pay for it with their cotton; that we should buy Russian iron, that they may sell their cotton; that we should buy Holland gin and linen, that they may sell their tobacco. In fine, that we should not grow wool; and dig and smelt the iron ore of our country; for, if we did, they could not sell their cotton. Now we have the same capacity for growing wool, and producing iron in our country, and to as unlimited extent, as they have for cotton in the South, and we should do it to the same extent, if we only had a market. Our Southern brethren would think it very unreasonable that they should be required to stop growing their cotton, to make a market among themselves for our wool, and that they should not wear even their own cotton, for, if they did, they could not wear so much of our wool. But their objections to this bill go this length. They admit you have the capacity to produce wool to an unlimited extent, and iron also. But, “fill your market with foreign wool and iron, and woollen and iron manufactures, that we may sell more cotton and tobacco.” Is this equal? No. By the bounty of Providence, in the peculiar adaptation of soil and climate, and the controlling influence of circumstances, our Southern brethren enjoy a monopoly of several staple articles, which command a steady and extensive market and a ready sale of Cotton, Indigo, Tobacco, and Rice, are four of them. These are vast and permanent sources of wealth and profit, enjoyed by no other section of our common country. These are the only productions of our country which find admittance into foreign ports to any extent; and they are now the means of purchasing the foreign fabrics consumed, not only in the South, but in the North also. I rejoice that any portion of our country is capable of producing a raw material of such universal demand. I trust they will always command a market, and be sought after by foreigners. But it is clearly unequal, and palpably unjust, that we should be required to forego our natural advantages, few and inferior as they are, for the purpose of extending theirs. The South will still be at liberty to sell their staples to foreigners, and to buy their manufactures of them. If they prefer buying of them to buying of us, we will not complain. Let them trade with foreigners. They can sell more cotton. We will still buy cotton and tobacco of them—all that we can wear and all that we can sell. If they are obliged to pay an increased duty when the goods arrive in their ports, so do we. In this we are equal. If they say that they shall consume more foreign manufactures than we, it is doubted. The North are the greatest consumers.

But, if they would avoid the increased duty, let them buy of us. We will soon sell to them as cheap as they can buy of England. Give us a market, steady and extensive, and we will soon furnish the necessary supply as cheaply, and of a better quality, than England. The example of coarse cottons is a proof of this.

But here the friends of the bill are met by a number of specious objections. We are charged with taxing the poor and necessitous, by imposing additional burdens upon articles of the most common necessity, which the poor consumer must have; that is, the poor will continue to consume the article imported, on which the additional duty is imposed, and thus be compelled to pay the additional tax. If this were true, there would be force in the objection. But if this be true, what becomes of the objection founded upon the diminution of revenue? For, if the poor continue to pay this tax in the consumption of the imported article, the revenue, instead of being diminished, will be increased in proportion to the increase of the duty. The objections are inconsistent. Both cannot stand. And again, if this objection be true, the object of the bill will be defeated; for the object of the bill is to induce the poor as well as the rich, to avoid the increased duty, by purchasing a superior and cheaper domestic article. Unless this object be attained, the revenue will be swelled beyond all due dimensions, and the friends of the bill will be greatly disappointed, and the opposers of the bill will be equally disappointed, as to its effect upon the revenue.

But the price of the domestic article will be equal to the imported, with the addition of the duty. Then the domestic article will be of a superior quality, or the consumer will buy the imported. But here lies the fallacy of the objection, and the fallacy has been shown by actual experiment, and may be made quite manifest in theory. The actual experiment to which I allude, is the article of coarse cottons. Every objection now raised against the proposed system, was vehemently urged against that experiment. But the experiment succeeded beyond the expectation of its most sanguine friends, and the objectors were silenced. So it will be as to the effect of the proposed system. The domestic article will be rendered cheaper and better, instead of dearer. The reason is obvious, but seems to have been overlooked. The proposed system will furnish a market, and a large one too. The increased demand will be met by an increased supply. And a large supply can be afforded at a cheaper rate than a small one, in the same proportion that the merchant who sells much will grow richer on a smaller profit than the one who sells but little. The principle of competition will ever render every thing on which it operates as cheap as it can be afforded. If our manufacturers can but sell what they manufacture, it will be difficult for the adversaries of this bill to show that our mechanics, with the advantages of machinery and cheapness of living, cannot manufacture as cheaply as foreigners. The only difficulty is the want of a market. Ours has been glutted to overflowing by foreign fabrics. Every expedient that ingenuity and wealth could devise, has been resorted to by foreign capitalists, and foreign politicians too; and in this they have been aided by our own merchants, to keep our markets full—to crowd in their manufactures into every empty spot—to force them back into the country, by the machinery of auction sales, and thus anticipate the wants of the country by a supply for several years. Our manufacturers cannot contend with this mighty odds. They must have a ready market; they must make ready sales or stop. Not so with the English; they must go on. They have already on hand at home, and in our markets, a supply for some time. Their immense capital, and the gratuities of the Government, enable them to do this. By this system our markets have been kept constantly filled with every thing but coarse cottons, which we have excluded by prohibitory duties.

But there are certain abstract elementary principles, very beautiful in theory, if adopted by the whole world, but totally impracticable as applicable to the relations of nations, and which no nation but our own ever did adopt, and none can adopt; and no nation having the least policy ever will adopt. "Buy where you can buy cheapest—leave trade to regulate itself;" or, in other words, permit the merchant to regulate, not only trade, but to determine what produce shall be grown in the country; and, in other words, permit the merchant, if he can make any thing by it, to import into a wheat-growing district a cheap cargo of wheat, and sell it to the consumers to the exclusion of the native wheat. True, the consequence is ruin to the farmer. He can raise no more wheat. What he has on hand he must sell at a loss, or it must perish. True, the soil has an inexhaustible supply of wheat in it, to be drawn forth by a proper application of labor to it. The laborers are here, the consumers are here, and the price of the purchase is here; and the wheat grower employs these consumers, and pays them for making his implements of husbandry and keeping them in repair; but it costs a little more to feed and clothe freemen than slaves. But trade should regulate itself; the merchant (true, he adds nothing to the wheat) can make some profit by adding something to the price; and the mechanic in the neighborhood of the farmer, who has heretofore been fed by him, "should buy where he can buy cheapest," and just now having a little cash, should buy the merchant's wheat instead of the farmer's. True, the cash goes abroad to pay for the foreign wheat, so cheaply produced by slaves, instead of going to the farmer, to enable him to pay his hired men, and raise another crop. "But trade should regulate itself;" and though the money is greatly needed in the country, you should send it abroad, to buy where you can buy cheapest, and you will thereby encourage commerce, and support the merchant, without reducing him to the necessity of productive labor. The same remarks are applicable to every other thing capable of being produced or made in this country. Take the article of wool. The farmer has it in abundance, or, which is the same thing, the capacity or capability of producing it in abundance; and he needs the manufacturer's cash. But, says the manufacturer, I must buy where I can buy cheapest. I can buy foreign wool cheaper than I can buy of you. True, it is not so good. True, you buy my cloth, and, unless I buy your wool, you cannot continue to grow it, nor to purchase my cloth. True, if I exchange my cloth for your wool, it matters little what nominal value we fix upon the articles, so that I get a reasonable compensation for my labor; and, though you need some cash with my cloth now, yet the person to whom you pay that cash needs it, perhaps, for the very purpose of buying cloth of me, and that will enable me to purchase more wool of you, or to buy more machinery, or pay my laborers; and thus we should retain it in the country, and keep it in circulation among us; yet I should violate the standing maxim of buying where I can buy the cheapest; so, I must send my money abroad to buy wool, where I can buy it cheapest, and you, and all my fellow-citizens, must send your money abroad to buy cloth where you can buy cheapest, and you must stop growing wool, and I must stop making cloth, and we must both do—what? Nothing, but buy, because we can buy cheap. Here, sir, is the cheap buying doctrine, your self-regulating doctrine; and the farmer and manufacturer, above mentioned, stripped of their cash, and reduced to the necessity of doing nothing, is a miniature picture of this our happy nation, and illustrates the blessed effects of these theoretical dogmas. The foreign tyrant, who compels his slaves to work for nothing, and to go naked and hungry, could not wish more subtle and sophistical advocates than those who urge this doctrine here. It induces us to buy of him. The purchase goes into his coffers; his treasures are filled; his armies and navies are sustained; his power is confirmed; and he is enabled to rivet his chains upon the nations.

Sir, this cheap buying doctrine is not suited to our condition, in our relation to other nations. To regulate our intercourse among ourselves, it is correct. To regulate our intercourse with foreign nations, it is, to say the least, unsound. The price of living is the price of labor; and, inasmuch as freemen will live better than slaves, and therefore consume more than slaves, in just so much will their labor cost more than slaves, as between them and their employments; in just so much will their condition approach the condition of their employers, and in just so much will they divide the profits of the business with the employer. The laboring classes of this country, be they rich or be they poor, through the blessing of Providence, stand on an equality, in point of privilege, with the kings and the nobles of the earth. Their style of living is, in some measure, correspondent to the dignity of their rank and station. It is respectable and comfortable, raising, in a proportionate degree, from servility and degradation, that portion of our fellow-citizens. The price of their living is proportionately expensive. This increase of expense must be sustained by increased wages—by an enlarged price for their labor. This price for their labor must be added to the price of their manufactures; and this must be paid by the consumer. God grant that the comfort and respectability of this class may always be thus sustained: God grant that we may never be able to compete with foreigners, in the point of cheapness of their labor, unless it be by elevating that class of the human family abroad, increasing their wealth and importance, and adding to the price of their manufactures, by adding to the price of their labor. We know many of them now to be miserably depressed. The scantiness of food and clothing which their wages supply to them, is extremely distressing. It is the want of abundance of wholesome food and comfortable clothing, and excessive over-working, that enfeebles their frames, and renders them meagre and sickly. Thus, the very flesh and blood, the life, of foreign mechanics, is wrought up into their fabrics, to render them cheap. The poor mechanic, reduced to pauperism, is supported by the parish, and let out to the manufacturer, to obtain a fourth, an half, or any other portion of weekly wages. This is common. The labor costs next to nothing. This renders their fabrics unnaturally cheap. Cheapened by distress; cheapened by the tears and groans of the wretched; cheapened by the shrivelled limbs and famished frames of the poor laborers. To cheapen them still more, and to keep our manufactures down, the English Government, I am well assured, pays a bounty, in the shape of loans, to the amount of several millions, to their manufacturers, to encourage them to go on and multiply their fabrics, and enable them to wait for a market, and sell them eventually for any thing they will fetch, for almost nothing.

And does this policy exhaust the English Government or the English nation? No, sir; it enriches them. Whatever they can sell their manufactures for, is so much clear gain. The greater the price, the more gain, to be sure; but any price is so much gain, so much tribute to England. This will appear, when we consider what it is that England sends abroad in the shape of manufactures. I mean, as to the mass of them. They cost her no cash. She sends abroad, in them, no cash. She produces the raw material. She has the mechanics and machinery to work it up, and her farmers to feed the artisans. These are her powers. By putting them in motion, her manufactures are produced. She sends them to us, and fills our markets. If she could not send them abroad, this motion would, to a certain degree, cease. She sends out nothing which would exist, if she did not send it out. It is her labor, wrapped up in a thousand various productions of her soil and mines, which she sells us, and we buy, which would in so much cease, if we did not buy. This labor is necessary to her health and vigor. When it stops, she must perish. She should then work for almost nothing over and above supplying her own wants, rather than be idle. She knows this, and therefore is not idle. If the master of the establishment cannot keep his hands at work, for the want of a ready market, and must dismiss them, the parish pays their subsistence, and the work goes on; and if that be not enough, the Government furnishes the raw material, and the work goes on. This costs nothing. The money does not go out of the kingdom—the power does not go out of the kingdom. It is but the effect of these powers, which does not exhaust or enfeeble her at all, but, on the contrary, keeps her in healthy action, and enriches her by just so much as she gets for her goods. Well may she afford to crowd them into our markets, and drive them into the country, by sales at auction, for if she can sell them for any thing more than the duties we impose, she is a gainer, and we are the loser. For, in just so much as England gains, we, or some one else, lose. We are exhausted. To be sure, we get an equivalent for our money, and perhaps more, but we consume it, when we might make it. England gets our money, and she does not consume it. This is the secret of her wealth and of our poverty. By this process of selling, England has been rendering all the nations of the earth, and us more than any other nation, tributary to her for centuries. A small tribute from all the various sections of the world, concentrated in so small a space, amounts to an enormous sum. Hence her wealth. It did not spring up out of her own soil. Her labor and ingenuity did not constitute it. They were the means. She exchanged these means for the gold and the silver and substantial wealth of other nations. With the wealth she has acquired, she is independent of the markets of the world so long as her own realms can produce the raw material, and subsistence for her population. And will gentlemen insist that we must buy of England, because we can buy of her so cheaply, when they examine the causes of that excessive cheapness? and do they look for the operation of those causes in this our country? I trust in a merciful Providence that neither we, nor our children, nor our children's children, may ever witness them here. And yet I do hope we shall no longer pursue a system of buying almost all we consume, except our food, and a great deal even of that, merely because we can buy cheaper than we can make or produce ourselves. We must stop this progress of depletion, or it will be stopped by perfect exhaustion, and the self-regulating system would never check the evil, until it terminated in debility and death.

Mr. Chairman, there are many other interesting topics of discussion, growing out of this subject. But I have trespassed too long, already, on the patience of this Committee, and I forbear. In conclusion, permit me to indulge the hope that the principles of the bill on your table will prevail. I see in them the wealth, the honor and independence, of my country. Adopt them, and ours will be, "the flocks upon a thousand hills." We have millions and millions of acres peculiarly fitted to the culture and pasturage of sheep. Give us our own market for their produce, and we will soon cover them. The sturdy arm of labor shall cause our mountains to disgorge their concealed treasure; the busy hum of industry shall succeed to the stupor and listlessness of poverty and idleness; and the voice of complaint and distress which now resounds from every quarter, shall be lost in the song of thankfulness and praise for deliverance from the evils under which we now suffer.

When Mr. MARTINDALE had concluded—

Mr. A. STEVENSON rose, not, he said, to make any remarks in reply to the speech which had just been delivered, but to dissuade both the friends and the opponents of the bill, from going into a discussion of its general principles, on the present motion. He thought the course pursued by the gentleman from New York, was without a parallel. After the House had, for two weeks, been engaged in a discussion which touched the vital interests of the country—after the two sides of the House, in relation to that discussion, had agreed, first to go into the several items of the bill; then to take up its general principles; and, if a decided majority should appear to be in its favor, then to agree to make its provisions as little exceptionable as possible—for that gentleman to get up and occupy the Committee for two days, with a speech against his own motion, and on the general principles of the bill—this was offering an indignity to the House, and was a course which this House ought to spurn. He hoped that a unanimous vote would pass, without discussion, against the motion, and he called on the friends, as well as the enemies of the bill, to pass such a vote.

Mr. FLOYD hoped that the House would vote for the gentleman's motion, and against his speech—in which it would appear that the gentleman had been peculiarly unfortunate, since scarcely any orator before ever failed of convincing, at least himself, that the measure he proposed was proper. In ordinary cases, Mr. F. said, he was against a motion of this kind; but this bill was of such an enormous character, that he should advocate the motion; it ought rather to have been entitled a bill to tear up commerce and destroy agriculture, than to amend the duties on imported articles.

Mr. CLAY was glad that gentlemen would, with whatever views, now vote on the general question; but he saw no cause for so much excitement against the course of the honorable gentleman from New York. It was, to be sure, unusual; it was not one to which he should have advised him. But it had only been adopted to bring up for discussion the general principle of the bill as separated from its details. But, though the course, in its form, was unusual; it was not so very unusual to see gentlemen make a speech on one side of a question, and afterwards vote on the other. He had seen frequent instances of this in his public life. He trusted gentlemen would not vote in favor of striking out. As to the bill going to tear up commerce, and God knows what—all that belonged to the discussion of its merits. And if the honorable gentleman from Virginia thought that such was its tendency, he should show it by argument rather than by violent expression. He hoped to hear that gentleman (to whom he always listened with interest) in answer to arguments in favor of the bill.

Mr. MARTINDALE rose, in reply to Mr. STEVENSON, and observed, that he had yet to learn that a motion which had been pronounced in order by the Chair could, with propriety, be considered as an indignity to the House, and if not with propriety, in what spirit had the remarks been made upon it which fell from the gentleman from Virginia? He would not say that those remarks offered an indignity to the House; but he would say that they were not according to the rules of this House. He had prefaced his motion, at the time he made it, with the explanatory remark, that the bill contained general principles equally applicable to one as to another of its items—that it was proper these principles should first be discussed, as otherwise their discussion would come up under each separate item, and might be repeated again and again, and it was likely they would, since gentlemen had given open warning that they meant to oppose the bill, step by step, and inch by inch. Would this be economy of time? In making the motion he had submitted, Mr. M. said he had taken his own judgment alone for his guide, and the established rules of this House, and he was not conscious of having offered to it any indignity.

Mr. STEVENSON, in reply to the Speaker, observed, that, while complaining of excitement in others, he seemed to have shown quite as much himself. In answer to the gentleman from New York, he disclaimed all reflection on the motives of that gentleman. He spoke only of the aspect and bearing of his motion, in connexion with the speech that accompanied it. He thought the course not only unusual, but disrespectful—inasmuch as, by parliamentary usage, the motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill should proceed from those who are opposed to its passage.

Mr. MARTINDALE said, that when he made the motion, he was not aware of any understanding entered into as to the course of discussion, nor did he think that any such understanding could properly exist.

Mr. COOK said that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. STEVENSON) would defeat his own object, if he succeeded in obtaining a silent vote on the motion to strike out, as such a motion, once passed upon, could not afterwards be repeated, and thus all general discussion would be precluded. But if he had rightly understood the gentleman from Virginia on his left, (Mr. BARBOUR,) it was the wish of members that the general principles of the bill should be discussed in the first instance.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR explained that he did not mean before the items had been gone through with.

Mr. COOK advocated that discussion, in order that the general objects of the bill might first be settled. If it was a bill to advance the general wealth and prosperity of the country by a system of home protection, it would require one kind of discussion; but, if it was merely a revenue bill, it would require quite another.

Mr. McDUFFIE said that there were no general principles that applied to the whole bill. It was a mass of particulars; and different principles were involved in each of its two hundred and sixty items. He, therefore, suggested to the gentleman from New York the propriety of withdrawing his motion.

The suggestion not being complied with—

Mr. CLAY observed that some experience in legislative bodies had taught him that more stress was often laid upon the modes and forms of doing public business than was at all necessary. If a discussion of the general principle was desired, it might be brought up on any one of the items of the bill. It would necessarily come up in a variety of forms. It was, however, the established parliamentary usage that a motion to strike out the enacting words (formally the first section) of a bill should precede the motions to alter its several features. This was the course lately pursued on the bill for internal improvements. Mr. C. again defended the gentleman from New York.

Some farther conversation took place on the mode of proceeding to be observed in the farther progress of the debate.

Mr. FLOYD made some remarks, which were heard but imperfectly.

Mr. LIVINGSTON protested against his vote not to strike out, being understood as committing him for the bill as it stood, because he viewed it, in its present form, as pregnant with mischief; but thought it might, with proper modifications, become the source of great public blessings.

Mr. HAMILTON said that he was not so incorrigible an infidel, in respect to the specific virtues of the bill, as gentlemen seemed to suppose. That when he had formerly said he should oppose it inch by inch, he meant in its then form; but, if suitably modified, he might possibly vote for it. But its friends seemed to wish to act the part of Dr. Sangrado, and not only compel the opponents to swallow the bill, but to swallow it whole, without any alteration.

The question being put on striking out the first section of the bill, was decided in the negative, 14 only rising in its favor.

The question then recurring on Mr. BRENT'S motion to strike out the clause laying a duty on cotton bagging—

Mr. POINSETT rose principally for the purpose of corroborating the statement made by his friend from Louisiana, in his argument to prove that the price of the cotton bagging was not paid by the consumer. In every market in Europe there is a tare allowed for the bagging, varying from four to five and six per cent., and a further deduction is made for the cotton which is frequently stained by the bad quality of the bagging. It is on this account that the cotton bagging of Kentucky, when brought into the same market with that of Dundee and Inverness, always sells from 50 to 75 per cent. lower. His friend from Pennsylvania (Mr. BUCHANAN) would readily perceive, therefore, that nothing short of a prohibitory duty will effect the object gentlemen have in view.

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

Mr. HOGEBOM objected to this duty, as bearing unequally on a particular class of the community. Those articles which bore an ad valorem duty were in the bill proposed to be raised only from 20 to 25 per cent., while on this article of bagging an increase of duty of from 60 per cent. was intended on that formerly laid. The chairman of the Committee on Manufactures confessed that the duty would be prohibitory. The honorable Speaker said it would only produce a competition between the American manufacturer and those of Inverness and Dundee. On that competition he wished to submit a few remarks. Those two small Scotch towns were situated in a high Northern latitude, (one in 57°, the other in 58°, N.,) in a poor and cold country. In order to procure the material for this cotton bagging, (there called hemp sacking,) they had to send up the Baltic, about twelve hundred miles, to Dantzic, and bring it to Inverness. All the fuel they used was brought from London and Liverpool. All the food they ate they bought. They were at great expense to get the article; for, having nothing to send out in exchange, their vessels went up the Baltic in ballast, and had to pay Sound duties at Elsinour. They were at great expense in sending out the manufactured article to this country, for it was bulky; they paid freight, commission, and insurance. And with all these charges on the article from its origin, and the duties added on its importation, they entered the market with the manufacturer of the West, who raised the material at his own door, and lived in a country where provisions were cheap and abundant, and yet they undersell him. How could this be? What was the explanation of a fact so extraordinary? It was, Mr. H. said, to be found in this—that the weavers of Inverness and Dundee worked with a degree of application that was unparalleled for sixteen hours a day—that is, one-fourth more per day than the laborer of the West, and two-thirds of the value of the coarse article they made lay in the labor they bestowed on it. Putting its value at 30 cents a yard, 20 cents of this price was purely the effect of labor; now, one-fourth of 20 cents is 5 cents; so that their extra labor, beyond the workman in this country, was equal to 5 cents a yard on all the bagging they manufactured. This was the whole secret. The Kentucky manufacturer will not work so hard as the Scotch manufacturer; and shall we for this, said Mr. H., lay a tax on our farmers? I spurn at it. I will act for the whole of my country—I will give to all alike—for this I came here, and in this course I hope I shall ever be found. The honorable Speak-

Mr. H. further said, that he should not have risen had a single man from the northern part of his own State spoken on any but one side of this question. He contended that the duty was not paid by the consumer, but by the grower of cotton; and if gentlemen meant to lay a duty on the cotton growers of the South, let them come out and say so at once. Was the cotton trade an unprofitable one to the United States? On the contrary, there was no branch of its trade more profitable. Yet he was not opposed to the whole bill. Some of its features he highly approved. But he was a decided enemy to this duty on cotton bagging.

Mr. BURTON said, that from the account given by the honorable Speaker, of the manufacture of this article in the West, it appeared that little or no capital was needed to carry it on. Much of it is performed by children, and living is low. Yet the Scotch article is furnished cheaper than the American. The reason Mr. B. stated to be in the dense population of Scotland, where every branch of labor was fully occupied, and its price diminished to about sixpence or a shilling a day—while in the west of our country it was forty or fifty cents. Mr. B. asked if it was just that all the rest of the Union should be taxed to make up this difference in the price of labor between Scotland and Kentucky? He knew that State was under great embarrassments at present, but she would soon get relief. She began to export much tobacco in addition to her hogs and horses. Yet the restless spirit to which the Speaker had with truth alluded, urged them to seek to bring a new article into the market; and they say to the people of the South, “do you be so good as to be at the whole expense of our bringing this new article into market.” Instead of this, they would do better to attend to the raising of people. Judging from the specimens on this floor, they would excel in that branch of domestic manufacture. The staple articles of export from North Carolina used to be pork and bacon, which they carried into Virginia; but Kentucky had, in a great measure, superseded this trade by underselling Carolina. She had lost the market, and was driven to the growing of cotton. How would the West like it if Carolina should ask Congress to make up to her the difference between the sterile and worn out soil of Carolina, and the fresh and fertile fields of Kentucky? Yet such a request would be as reasonable as that now urged by Kentucky.

Mr. OWEN, in reply to Mr. TRIMBLE’S remark, some days since, upon the weight of bagging being included in that of the bale of cotton, and sold as cotton, produced a calculation to show that, in Liverpool, (the ultimate market, by which the price of cotton was regulated,) a deduction in weight was made for the bagging and the bale rope of three per cent. on uplands, by which a bale of 360 lbs. lost 11½ lbs.; Louisiana cotton lost 18½ lbs., and Havre de Grace 25 lbs.—much more than twice the price of the bagging.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. TRIMBLE, in reply, said, that this loss fell on the foreign consumer, the various charges being eventually added to the price of the article; so that, in the end, the bagging and cotton going in together to make up that price, the bagging did sell as cotton. If it cost the planter less than cotton, he gained by it; if more, he lost. Mr. T. illustrated his position by comparing the tare and transportation on cotton with those on tobacco, and concluded by inquiring whether the gentleman from New York (Mr. HOGEBOOM) meant to advocate such a form of the tariff as would compel the people of Kentucky to work like beasts of burden sixteen hours a day? Was this the equality he spoke of? He said he would protect iron and wood, but not bagging. Let the iron forgers work sixteen hours a day, and let the sheep eat sixteen hours a day, and they would need no more protection than the manufacturers of bagging.—Surely, seven large States could raise hemp enough, and manufacture it too, to supply five comparatively small States. He protested against making the people of the United States beasts of burden.

Mr. HOGEBOOM, in reply, said, that according to the gentleman's own illustration from tobacco, the question resolved itself into this—whether it was better to go to a market where, on a hogshead of tobacco worth $150, tare was deducted, than to take it to another market where the same hogshead brought $150 without any tare being deducted at all.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Committee then rose, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 25.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of James Johnson," reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH made a report on the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting a statement prepared by William Lambert, explanatory of his astronomical observations and calculations, made with a view to establish the longitude of the Capitol; which report was laid on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the committee appointed on the memorial of the Columbia Institute, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the benefit of the said Institute; which bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution laid on the table by Mr. WRIGHT, on the 17th instant, and, being read, was agreed to:

Ordered, That the report of the Committee on the Public Lands upon the subject of the robbery of the land office at Vandalia, in the State of Indiana, be committed to the Committee of the Whole House to which is committed the bill for the relief of the assignees and legal representatives of John H. Piatt, deceased.

Mr. BAILEY, offered the following:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections, to which were referred several papers respecting the right of the member returned from Norfolk district, in Massachusetts, to his seat in this House, be instructed to report whether any other members, returned to this House, were not, at the time of their election, inhabitants of the States from which they were respectively returned, with the facts of the cases, and their opinion thereon; and that the committee have powers to send for persons and papers.

Mr. BAILEY supported his resolution, and objected to the principle that mere living in a place constituted inhabitancy, in the sense of the Constitution, and showed that, if admitted, it would apply to foreign Ministers, and would exclude sitting members of this House; and he quoted precedents.

Mr. SLOANE replied to Mr. BAILEY, and opposed the propriety of the resolution, inasmuch as the House was already in possession of sufficient information on the subject.

After some farther observations from Mr. BAILEY and Mr. FORSYTH, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. JENNINGS, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further legislative provision may be necessary to secure the accountability to the Treasury, of the clerks and marshals of the circuit and district courts, for fines and forfeitures which may accrue to the United States.

On motion of Mr. SIBLEY, the Committee on Agriculture were instructed to inquire if an increase of the duty, now established by law, on any article of foreign growth or manufacture, will be for the interest of the agriculturist, and, if there be any such article, to name the same, together with the additional amount of duty which they deem beneficial to the agricultural interest.

On motion of Mr. STEWART, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to Colonel Rees Hill a just compensation for certain expenditures by him incurred, in furnishing supplies, &c., for the regiment of militia under his command, on the northern frontier, during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. MCKEAN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the justice and propriety of so altering and amending the act of the 18th of March, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war," and the several additional and supplementary acts thereto, passed May 1st, 1820, and March 3d, 1823, so that the provisions of the aforesaid act of the 18th of March, 1818, shall be extended, generally, and without distinction, to all and each of the surviving "commissioned and non-commissioned officers, musicians, private soldiers, and all officers in the hospital department and medical staff, who served faithfully in the war of the Revolution, for the term of nine months, or more, at one period of the war;" and, also, to every commissioned officer, mariner, or marine, who served at the same, and for a like term, in the naval service of the United States, without having reference or regard to the amount of the property possessed by any such individual, and also, without regard to any particular description of troops in which such person may have served.

The resolution being read, the question was put, "Will the House consider the same?" and was determined in the negative.

On motion of Mr. LITTLE, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the per diem allowance of jurors attending the several district courts.

On motion of Mr. HENRY, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Larkin N. Akers, (a soldier who was wounded in the head, in Dudley's defeat, during the late war, and has from that cause been afflicted with paroxysms of epilepsy,) upon the pension list.

Mr. RICHARDSON, of Michigan, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a district court of the United States in the Territory of Michigan.

The resolution was read, and laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that all persons who shall voluntarily engage to serve in the Navy six months, during peace, and twelve months during war, shall be exempted from all militia duty, except when in cases of great public danger the levy in mass shall be ordered—collectors of the customs, on receiving the names and description of the persons making the engagement, to register the same, giving to each person so registered, a certificate of registry, setting forth his name, age, place of nativity, height, complexion, and general description. Every master of a merchant vessel, whether engaged in the coasting or foreign trade, to specify in his shipping articles, in an appropriate column, opposite to each person's name, such as did or did not, on signing the articles, produce certificates of registry. Every master of a merchant vessel, whether engaged in the coasting or foreign trade, to deposite in the office of the collector, at every port in the United States, from which he may clear or enter his vessel, a certified copy of his shipping articles. The collector of the customs to transmit, quarter yearly, to the Secretary of the Treasury, the names and quality of persons belonging to vessels entering or clearing at the custom-house, within the quarter, designating those who enrol themselves, from those who do not. Whenever the service is required by Government, the persons to perform it, to be ascertained by lot; no person to perform two tours of duty, till all those who are liable to serve, and are within reach of the Government, shall have served their tour. Persons in the public service, to be liable to all the discipline of the Navy, to have the same pay and rations as if regularly enlisted, the same pensions, if disabled while in the public service, and the same prize money; to be punctually discharged when the time of service shall expire, and, if unavoidably detained, to receive as a compensation, twenty-five per cent. in addition to their pay, for the surplus time. After eighteen months from the date of the act, no person to be considered as a destitute American seaman in foreign countries, and as such entitled to relief under the act or acts of Congress, who shall not have enrolled himself to serve in the Navy as aforesaid. That authority be given to Government to take apprentices, native boys, not less than twelve, nor more than fourteen years old, to serve in the Navy seven years, the number, annually, to be one to every two guns mounted on board ships in commission; the United States to provide a schoolmaster for every national vessel of not less than twelve guns, to teach the apprentices reading, writing, and cyphering, and such other branches of learning, as their capacities may indicate; to find them food and clothes, and, after the expiration of the fifth year, to allow them two dollars per month; at the expiration of the seventh year, to give them a full suit of clothes, and, if meritorious, a certificate of good behaviour, and a sum of money not exceeding twenty dollars; the most promising may be selected during apprenticeship and promoted to midshipmen, master's mate, or any other inferior grade of office; if promoted to midshipmen or master's mates, then their indenture to cease from the day of their promotion; a roll to be kept in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, of all apprentices, showing their age, nativity, and date of their indentures; apprentices transferable from ship to ship, as the good of the service may require, which will give them a knowledge of all classes of ships; that merchant vessels shall take apprentices: vessels of 100 tons, one; 200 to 300 tons, two; of 400 to 600 tons, three; of 700 tons, four; &c. &c.

On motion of Mr. METCALFE, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation for the payment of Philemon Thomas, Benjamin P. Thomas, and Lewis Craig, for services rendered in taking Fort Baton Rouge, in 1810, and for losses sustained by them in effecting that object.

On motion of Mr. LIVINGSTON, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the propriety of making provision by law for the making roads, levees, and other such works on the lands of the United States, in the State of Louisiana, as would be required if such lands were in the hands of individuals.

On motion of Mr. BRECK, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the times appointed by law for the payment of pensions.

On motion of Mr. McCALL, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a mail route from the Creek Agency in the State of Georgia, passing by Fort Gaines, to the new seat of government in the Territory of Florida.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, accompanied by a report from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, respecting the construction given to the act of 1821, for the relief of purchasers of public lands, as relates to the compensation of registers and receivers of the land offices, made in obedience to a resolution of the House, of the 11th instant; which communication was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to regulate the surveying of public and private lands in the southern part of Alabama," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill of this House, entitled "An act to repeal in part an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation of marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" with amendments. The Senate have also passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to 'An act to perfect certain locations and sales of the public lands in Missouri,' passed April 26th, 1822," in which amendments, and bill last mentioned, they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal in part an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" were read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to amend the several acts for laying duties on imports.

And the question still being on the motion of Mr. BRENT to strike out the clause of the bill laying a duty of six cents a yard on cotton bagging, the debate was renewed, and it continued with unceasing ardor till past four o'clock.

The debate was opened by a speech from Mr. LIVINGSTON, of Louisiana, (on whose motion the Committee had risen the evening previous.) Professing himself decidedly friendly to the encouragement of domestic manufactures, he addressed himself, as a friend, to the friends of that measure; and urged, as a general principle, the propriety of extending legislative encouragement only to such manufactures as there was a reasonable prospect would flourish if protected. Cotton bagging, he contended, was not one of these. It was the very last that needed it, for it required, as had been admitted by its friends, little capital or machinery, and the hands employed in it could easily be turned to another occupation. To these features he would add another. The raw material concerned was not, and never could be, raised in abundance and of good quality in this country. The proof of this was to be found in the fact, that a protecting duty, gradually raised, since 1790, from $10 to $20, to $30, and now to $40, per ton, (100 per cent. beyond the price of the article itself, in Russia,) had proved insufficient to produce it. We had manufactures in this country, the material of which was hemp, they were flourishing, and yet, such was the inferiority of the American article, that they preferred to pay this enormous duty to making any use of it. If asked for the reason of this inferiority, he could not explain it; gentlemen tell us it is in the manner of rotting it; he doubted the fact—but, be that as it might, good hemp was not made.

Mr. L. in the course of his remarks, complained that a duty should be laid on all the cotton growing States, not for the good of the whole Union, but of a single State; for the manufacture existed in Kentucky alone. He doubted that the duty, if laid, would prove any material benefit, even to the Kentucky manufacturers, because the article they made was so inferior, that the foreign would still be used in preference. Mr. L. quoted a price current of 1822, to prove that when the price of the imported bagging was 45 to 50 cents, that of the home made was only 25; there was always a difference of at least 10 cents a yard. The Kentucky bagging was not so strong, and it stained and injured the cotton. Gentlemen, indeed, tell us it will be made better, and to produce this, they would exclude the foreign article altogether—strange, that, when all competition was removed, the article should improve, in proportion as all inducement to improve it was taken away. If it could have been made better, it would have been, long ago. As to the prohibitory duty's keeping money in the country, Mr. L. said, the Dundee manufacturer had only to remove to New York, carry on his factory till he had made a fortune, and then retire to the banks of the Tweed, and what would this country gain? He entreated gentlemen not to identify this duty with the bill, and vote for it on party principles against the opposers of the bill. They might approve and vote for the bill, and yet strike this out as pernicious.

Mr. SHARPE, of New York, then rose, and said, that he would be the last man on that floor, to cramp the commercial interests of this country; but agriculture and manufactures went hand in hand with commerce, and unless they were fostered, that must soon perish. Mr. S. said he must look at things as they had been, and as they now were. He described the flourishing state of these interests while the calamities of Europe continued, and their sudden depression at the restoration of peace. The fostering of similar interests at home by the European Powers, left us without a market for our products. The farmer hung his harp upon the willow, and the merchant began to turn his capital to manufactures. But, while Europe shut out our breadstuffs, we continued to import her manufactures—the country was perfectly inundated by them, and drained of its last dollar to pay for them. The precious metals disappeared, and we supplied their place by lampblack and rags. The country was as completely inundated with paper money as with British goods.

Yet we are told—let agriculture alone, it will regulate itself; let commerce alone, it will regulate itself; let manufactures alone, they will regulate themselves. What were gentlemen sent here for? to let agriculture, commerce, and manufactures alone—to let them alone, till, having languished and died, they had regulated themselves! Would gentlemen tell their constituents that they had rather read their petitions, and then let them alone to regulate themselves?

H. OF R.

Mr. S. then stated the question, as now before the Committee; said the South was the last part of the Union that should complain, having protecting duties on cotton and sugar, and asked whether it was not a stain on the American character that a country that raises the finest cotton on the face of the globe, should be dependent on two little Scotch towns for a bag to put it in? Was this the result of prejudice?—if so, how different a prejudice was it from that which our fathers felt, when they brought away even their dwellings with them—dwellings, some of which stand at this day, as monuments of the sort of prejudice that then prevailed.

It was said this was a war between Louisiana and Kentucky—a new scheme of the West. [Here Mr. CAMBRELENG rose, and denied having used that expression.] Mr. S. said that other States, besides Kentucky, were concerned, and would gladly enter into the manufacture, if protected. He then stated the nature of the trade of Kentucky, dwelt on her entire dependence on the Southern States for a market, and urged this as an argument in favor of a protection for this branch of her industry. Mr. S. greatly doubted what was advanced about our inability to make this article; he never could bring his mind to believe that it was beyond the utmost reach of American ingenuity and enterprise to make a bag. As to its staining the cotton, that was a complaint never heard on this side of the Atlantic; he rather thought the stain was felt to be on the Scotch character and interest, and hence the complaints. He did not believe the addition of three cents to the present duty would amount to a prohibition; but if it did, some small sacrifice ought to be submitted to for the good of other parts of the Union. On this principle he had voted for the duty on foreign spirits, because he thought Connecticut should submit to that sacrifice. She would have an equivalent in the duty on straw hats. So in this article, the number of yards imported might be diminished; but the manufactures of the country would be benefited, and ultimately the price to the planter reduced rather than augmented.

Mr. S. insisted that to the planter the merchant who buys his cotton for exportation is in fact the consumer; he allows only two pounds tare on a bale; all the rest of the weight of the bag is sold as cotton. Whereas the farmer is forced to allow the full tare of his tobacco hogshead or flour barrel. Mr. S. quoted a Louisiana price current of last month, to show that while the foreign article is bringing from 24 to 26 cents, the home-made brings from 18 to 19—a very different proportion from that quoted by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The precious metals were so plenty in England that the Bank of England sends them to the country banks, free of expense, and lends to farmers, on bond and mortgage, at 4 per cent.; dollars were under par 6 or 8 per cent. While here the precious metals have almost disappeared, and farmers cannot get loans at any rate of interest. Yet we are told, let things alone.

In conclusion, Mr. S. said that it was urged, that, if we lay this duty, England will cease to take our cotton; he was under no such apprehension. Even our duty on coarse cottons themselves had produced no such effect. England never took a pound of our cotton out of favor; nor will she for a moment, if she can get either better or cheaper. She will serve that as she has done our breadstuffs, the moment she can; but it was not a threepenny duty on a bag that will produce such a result.

Mr. LIVINGSTON replied, and thought it was not treating the understandings of gentlemen with respect, to urge that the three cent duty on cotton was a protection, when, instead of importing, we largely exported the article. Let the duty be repealed, instantly, no cotton-grower would complain. He admitted that the duty on sugar did, in some degree, protect that article; but it was laid with such intent, and would have been laid for revenue, had Louisiana not made a single pound of sugar. As to the manufacturers of the North taking the Southern cotton, would they take it if they could get it as cheap elsewhere? England, then, acted as they did. But the gentleman says there is no danger of her ceasing to take our cotton, even though we cease to receive her manufactures. But did not the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. TOMLINSON) state to the House that the Connecticut merchant takes the West India rum at a dead loss for the sake of the profit of the outward cargo? And the same principle might induce England to take our cotton. Withdraw the inducement, and she ceases to take it.

Mr. L. reiterated his question, why was not good hemp raised here, if it could be raised? A duty of $40 a ton, and a difference in price of $40 more, made, together, a bounty of $80 a ton to the American hemp grower over the hemp grower of Russia. Were the people of Orange county mad or blind? They must be one or the other, if, with such a bounty, they did not raise the article. The manufacturer refused to take our hemp, and now, to aid manufactures, you propose to increase the duty on foreign. Very extraordinary. Gentlemen say lay the duty, and the hemp will be better. He believed no such thing; but that it would rather grow worse. As to the argument from the reduced price of coarse cottons, the fact was true; but the inference false; because that was an article the very reverse of this. There, the material was abundant, and of the best quality, and almost the whole value of the manufactured article was derived from machinery; here, the material was acknowledged to be bad, and the manufacture employed no machinery at all.

Mr. SHARPE explained. He did not complain of the duty on sugar; but only urged it to show, that, above all other States, Louisiana should not complain. When she sent two hundred hogsheads of sugar to the North, the protecting duties on that quantity amounted to six thousand dollars, over and above the price that would otherwise have been paid. As to the bad quality of the hemp, it arose from not being water rotted, and he had heard a Southern gentleman say that there was not water enough in Kentucky to rot it. If so, he wished to supply, from elsewhere, both water and hemp.

The Tariff Bill.

H. OF R.

Mr. LIVINGSTON resumed. The gentleman says they can make good hemp in New York. I again ask him, "Why don't you then?" For want of a market? No. There are flourishing manufactories of sail duck and cordage at your very door. Why don't you take it to Patterson? Because the people at Patterson won't take your hemp.

As to the duty on sugar—there are, in Louisiana, perhaps two hundred persons who make sugar; and because these two hundred persons receive a benefit from a general law of the whole Union, must therefore all the other inhabitants of Louisiana be taxed for the benefit of Kentucky? Shall I sacrifice ninety-nine of my constituents because one is benefited? Away with such arguments!

The gentleman has produced a late paper to show that the home bagging is now within six cents of the foreign, in the New Orleans market. I will explain this. The planters have all got their supply, long since, and the price is now merely nominal. But why any difference? It is from prejudice, they tell us. Why, sir, we know no more of the Scotchmen at Inverness, than that gentleman knows about the Chinese; nor, much as we may love Scotchmen, are we willing, out of love, to give them from six to ten cents a yard more on the bagging they send us. As to the planter deducting only two pounds tare on a bale of cotton, when he sells it to the merchant—suppose he deducted none at all, and sold every ounce of bagging and bale rope as cotton, does not the merchant, who knows that he shall have to deduct the whole tare at Liverpool, allow for this, think you, in the price he gives the planter?

Mr. L. again deprecated so great and sudden a change in our internal policy, as the bill, unless modified, would produce. Shall we, said he, because a rock lies many miles ahead, put the ship about with all standing? No. Let us take time to clew up some of our sails first.

Money may be very plenty in Britain just now. The boys may be playing at chuck-farthing with guineas. But, to say that this is the effect of their protecting duties, won't do, when we know that, under the same duties, money has been almost as scarce there as with ourselves. Besides, those duties have been laid in Britain to encourage exportation. But, are we ready to export our manufactures? No, sir; our luxuriant soil, our multiplied harbors, point us out, by the hand of Nature herself, as an agricultural and a commercial nation. These must be our great national characteristics. Manufactures are a third interest, and a subordinate one. Manufacture if you can, but do not force the country into such a system as is fit for Britain. It would be pernicious, as well to the morals, as to all the fundamental interests of the United States.

Mr. TOL rose in reply. The gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. HAMILTON) had not gone far enough; when he said this bill would be resisted inch by inch—he should have said, half inch by half inch, and hair's breadth by hair's breadth. Here had the House been sitting and debating for ten days, on the very refined article of cotton bagging! Mr. T. produced a letter from a mercantile gentleman of intelligence at Sag Harbor, stating that the American hemp was there preferred to the Russian. The gentlemen from the cotton country, said Mr. T., resist the principle of a compromise of interests for the general good, and cry out, "we get nothing." When reminded of the duty on cotton, they say it was laid for revenue. For revenue! when not a bale of cotton was imported. They ask, Is it fair we of the South should pay three cents more duty on bagging? We ask, Is it fair that all the rest of the Union should pay the South three cents a pound on their sugar? They talk to us about their distresses too! Let us look at their distress. Mr. T. then produced a calculation, in a New Orleans paper, showing that the annual profit on every slave employed in the sugar plantations, was from five to seven hundred dollars. [Mr. LIVINGSTON denied having spoken of distress.] Well, said Mr. T., others did. But, in other parts of the Union, there does exist real distress. A proof of which is in this one fact—that the United States exports, at this day, notwithstanding all her increase in population and territory, less of the staple commodities of the country than she did in 1790. And of this amount, those five cotton growing States, that are now to be ruined—yes, ruined!—by a duty of three cents more on bagging, export more than the whole Union besides. The gentleman asks, Why don't we make the article better? The same question was asked us, when we asked for a duty on coarse cottons. We got the duty, and we made them better. Give us a duty on bagging, and we will make that better too. Gunpowder, coaches, saddles, boots, shoes, are all protected by duties of thirty and forty per cent.; and what is the consequence? We make them good—we make them cheap—and we begin to export them. Why? We have got the market. Give us the market for bagging, and that will follow suit. The duty in the bill, is the very duty recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury—himself a Southern man—who should know, at least, as much about the revenue as the gentlemen who cry out that it will be ruined—and as much about the interests of the South, as other Southern gentlemen. As to the duty being prohibitory, I certainly did not mean that it would be so by any other force, any other compulsion, than that of interest and voluntary choice. But if, as the gentleman says, they will still import the articles, why, then it will help the revenue that they tell us is to be destroyed, and so it will only operate in favor of the bill. Gentlemen cry out about a tax on the Southern States! Let them look at the bounty on sugar. Louisiana now raises thirty millions of pounds, the protecting duty on which is nine hundred thousand dollars! more than the whole duty on bagging—

H. of R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

more, twice over, than is laid by that duty on the whole Southern country put together.

Mr. LETCHER said, he was very sensible this was rather a dry argument, and by this time it was pretty nearly threadbare. The gentleman from Louisiana, who introduced the motion, he did not see in his place to-day. He presumed he had broken himself down by his exertion. That gentleman tried to convince the House that we could not make enough of the article. Being pretty well beaten off of that ground, his colleague had taken another, and had labored equally hard to convince the House that, if we did make enough, it would not be good enough. Of this subject, he presumed fact would be preferred to speculation—and he had a witness before him, just arrived from one of the factories concerned. It was a thread made out of the hemp now used for the bagging made at Lexington, and he wished that gentleman would be good enough to examine it. He entreated honorable gentlemen to consider the condition of the people of Kentucky. They had tried the raising of tobacco. They had carried it to Louisiana for a market, and had returned losers. They had tried the raising of corn; it was the same thing—of whiskey; the same thing. They can raise no one article that will return them a profit. As soon as there is a demand, so great is the competition, and so eager the desire to carry on a trade of almost any kind, that the market is glutted, and the price instantly falls. He defied the gentleman from Louisiana to point out one single article of those which Kentucky could supply, that had ever been scarce at New Orleans. The gentleman says he is in favor of the general principle of the bill—but he seems to oppose its provisions in detail. He puts me in mind of a debtor of whom I once heard, who, when applied to, to pay the interest of an old debt, said it was against his principle to do so—and, when asked, then, to pay the principal, replied, it was against his interest. If we apply to him to sanction the duty on bagging, he says it is against his interest; and, when we ask him to support the other parts of this bill, I expect he will tell us it is against his principle; so that, between his interest and his principles, I presume the bill will not get much support from him.

The first question is, Can this article be made in sufficient quantity? We have shown that it can. They then tell us, If we do give you the duty, you will only lose the market, for then it will be made in New York.

[Mr. LIVINGSTON explained.]

If, said Mr. L., enough can be raised, no matter where, then the plain question is, Whether it is better to make it ourselves, or to go to a foreign market to get it. And, while we ask this small protecting duty, we tell the gentleman that Kentucky can export nothing, to any profit, but her hemp. As to the bad quality of the article—when we had the whole of the market, during the late war, did we hear any complaint from the factories, that it injured the cotton? No, sir. These complaints come from abroad. They are Scotch complaints, in an English dress. But, granting that the article is not at present as good as could be desired—I ask, Will not this duty, by giving us our own market, induce competition among ourselves? It has done so in cotton, and while it has raised the quality, it has lowered the price.

Mr. OWEN rose to explain a remark he had made as to the effect of an observation of a gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TRIMBLE.) He replied, again, to the argument respecting bagging selling at the price of cotton—and to that of the planter not being the exporter; and showed that the exporter being governed by the price allowed in the foreign market, it resulted in the same thing to the planter, as if he was the exporter himself. He retorted the charge of inconsistency.

Mr. LIVINGSTON explained, and repeated some of his former positions, and still insisted that, if, with a bounty of eighty dollars a ton, which is more than half the whole price, they had not raised hemp that the manufacturer would make use of, there was little prospect that they would in future. When the American manufacturer will consent to take our hemp at all, then a protecting duty may, with more propriety, be asked for. The argument from the effect of the duty on coarse cottons would not hold—because, when that duty was laid, the material was already of the very best quality, and the fabric was made almost wholly by machinery. He was sorry to find his declarations met with so little credit from the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. LETCHER;) his conduct, he trusted, would always show that he was not in the habit of making false declarations—he hoped that the gentleman's prophecy about an improvement in hemp would prove more correct than about his not supporting the general principle and provisions of this bill.

Mr. CLAY was happy to hear such a declaration from the honorable member from Louisiana, and he was now about to put those declarations to the test. I, said Mr. C., am a hemp grower, (that is, at such times as the situation of the country and the regulations of Government render it possible, without loss.) The gentleman seems to believe that it is impossible, in this country, to make the article good. Sir, as nature delivers it to our hands, it is of as fine a quality as any in the world; it has no natural, inherent defect of any kind whatever. The only difficulty attends the treatment of it after it is cut down or pulled up, (for both modes are pursued.) It is then either dew-rotted or water-rotted. When it is to be dew-rotted, it is stacked till the month of December or January, and then spread under the snow till February—this is called dew-rotting. In the other process, the hemp is immersed in ponds or running streams, where some process goes on by which the glutinous part of the vegetable is dissolved, and when dry it is submitted to an operation called breaking. When thus prepared, the hemp of this country is, in all respects, equal to the Russian, and commands as high a price.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, on my right, (Mr. LATHRUP,) tells me that he always water-rots his hemp. I have known in Kentucky entire crops to be water-rotted; and it may be done wherever hemp is raised, if we were only favored with the protection of Government to secure to us our own market.

Proceedings.

The gentleman from Louisiana says that we have already a bounty of eighty dollars a ton, and yet the manufacturer will not take the hemp we raise. Does not the gentleman know that this observation applies only to the dew-rotted? And, besides, what is the bounty without any certainty of the market? A cargo of three or four hundred tons imported will destroy the market for a whole crop. If the gentleman doubts this, will he guarantee the market? The farmers of Kentucky have given this matter a sufficient trial; pressed by suffering at home, and lured by the flattering promises of hope, they have again and again ventured, and again and again they have been broken down by foreigners—by the serfs and boors of Russia. If adequate protection was given, the water-rotted hemp would speedily supersede the dew-rotted article, and all the hemp of the country would become good. But, even the dew-rotted hemp will answer every purpose for cotton bagging, provided the bales are not exposed to the wet. But the gentleman asks, with an air of triumph which I was sorry to witness, why don't you do it? If you can make a good bagging, why is bagging of your make always ten cents a yard below the imported? And he quotes from a price current, to show that ours is put down at half price. But what is the date of that paper? 1822. The very year in which the manufacture was languishing and almost destroyed, and in the latter part of which it began to revive. Yet he reiterates upon us the question, why don't you at once make it both cheap and good? Sir, we want to breathe. We are, in this respect, just born. Our factories are but eighteen months in being, and already they have reduced the Scotch price. The gentleman objects to the recent paper quoted by my honorable friend over the way, (Mr. SHARPE,) because the planters, he says, are all supplied, nothing is doing in the market, and the price is nominal merely. But, sir, I am in possession of another paper, only two or three days later than that quoted, and a different price is given, which shows that there is, at this time, some activity in the market. The majority of the planters may be supplied; but there are also provident men, who reserve their purchases till the market is lowest. When I left my home, which was at the time when the purchases are usually made, I saw letters from highly respectable men, which stated that the bagging of Kentucky (from one particular factory at Lexington) was then bringing a price equal to the Scotch article. Sir, we only ask you to let our manufactures exist under hope, and in eighteen months, my word for it, you will have bagging as good as the Scotch, in equal abundance, and at a less price.

Before I sit down, I must add a word or two in reply to a gentleman from New York, (Mr. HOGGBOOM,) who told us that the manufacturers of Dundee lived in a cold climate, bought their fuel, and brought their hemp from Dantzic, though they had nothing to give for it in exchange. Why, sir, though I do not in the least doubt that honorable member had fully convinced his own mind that this was so, did he know so little about trade as not to be aware that it was not the manufacturer, but the merchant who imports the material of British manufactures? And does he suppose that nothing goes from Britain up the Baltic, for the hemp and iron that come down the Baltic? I repeat what I before mentioned, that the Scotch manufacturer may afford to make a sacrifice for a time—that he may enjoy the monopoly in the end. But if that gentleman is really convinced that there must be a monopoly of this article somewhere, would he not rather give it to the American than to the Scotch manufacturer? I put it to his patriotism.

The gentleman from Louisiana says that this manufacture is in no need of protection, because we have been obliged to take our hands from it and employ them in other occupations. Sir, we have done so, it is true—lamentably true. We have tried the raising of tobacco; we have tried horses; we have tried hogs; we have tried hemp; the industry of the country roams from object to object, trying every thing, and alike in vain. We want protection—we ask this Government for protection—not against our brethren—not against other States, but against strangers.

Mr. TON said, in reply to a remark respecting drawback, that this bill touched no drawback whatever. If the one and a half pence sterling allowed by the British Government on bagging is a drawback, this bill has nothing to do with it, and six cents will be the whole duty; and this is the very amount recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, himself a Southern man.

Mr. COBB. I don't care who recommends it, I am opposed to it. The Secretary, however, means six cents on the running yard, not on the square yard.

Mr. TON. Admit this; it is only equal to the raising of the duty from twenty to twenty-five per cent. Yet, surely, the Government would not be so short-sighted as to lay a duty on the running yard, which might at once be evaded by increasing the width of the goods.

Mr. CAMBRELENG. At the time the Secretary recommended six cents on the square yard, that sum differed very little from the ad valorem duty.

Mr. MCKIM. It is a bounty, and not a drawback, that Britain allows; it is, therefore, included by the 3d section of this bill, and the duty is ten cents, and not six.

The Committee then rose, on motion of Mr. McDUFFIE, who expressed a desire to deliver his views more fully on the subject.

WASHINGTON, February 25, 1824.

The Message was read and laid on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting "a statement exhibiting the amount of postage received, during the year 1822, at each post office in the United States and Territories thereof;" rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House, of the 11th of December last; which letter and statement were laid on the table.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, made a report on the petition of Judah Alden, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to which was referred a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the said District, reported "a bill to provide for the government of the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENT, from the same committee, to which was referred a memorial upon the subject, reported a bill amendatory of the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the Civil Department of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. McKEAN, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, made a report on the petition of Henry Lightner, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRECK, by leave of the House, presented a memorial and remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Philadelphia, against the passage of the bill now pending before this House, to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports; which memorial was referred to the Committee of the whole House on the state of the Union to which the said bill is committed.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the annual appropriation for diplomatic intercourse.

On motion of Mr. REYNOLDS, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing, by law, the value of three rifle-guns, pressed from Ica Robertson, Joseph Rosson, and Robert Tolar, during the late war.

On motion of Mr. REED, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing John Perry, second, a Revolutionary soldier, on the pension list.

On motion of Mr. GURLEY, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting to actual settlers, reported by the commissioners of the land office at St. Helena Court-house, in the State of Louisiana, under the act of Congress, of the 3d March, 1819, a right of pre-emption to one section of land, including their improvements, in all cases where such settler is not entitled to said land as a donation, or by title derived from, or conferred by, the Government of the United States.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to actual settlers, who, by the act of the 3d of March, 1819, were entitled to the right of pre-emption, further time for making payment for such lands, under the act aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the United States Attorney for the western district of Louisiana.

The resolution was opposed by Mr. COCKE. Mr. BRENT explained, and rejoined in defence of the resolution.

Mr. GURLEY corroborated the statements of Mr. BRENT, and the resolution was carried—ayes 87, noes 72.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to report to this House, whether the tariff bill, now under consideration, will, in his opinion, if it passes into a law in its present shape, "simplify the collection of duties on imports;" and whether its operation will, without being "onerous to the community, tend to augment the revenue, prove salutary to commerce, and beneficial to the manufactures of the country;" and that the Clerk be directed to furnish the Secretary of the Treasury with a copy of the bill, as reported by the Committee on Manufactures.

The resolution was laid on the table, without debate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the new Tariff bill, the question on striking out the duty on cotton bagging still pending,

Mr. McDUFFIE had the floor, but he yielded it, by courtesy, to

Mr. CAMPBELL, of South Carolina, who opposed the duty in a short speech. He insisted that this duty was equal to a direct tax of two per cent. on all the Southern States, and equal to a bounty of one hundred dollars apiece to every laborer in Kentucky who was employed in the manufacture. The manufactures of Kentucky were stated to be, at present, in a state of activity; and, if that fertile State produced more than she could sell or consume, it was unfair to tax the Southern States on account of her fertility, &c.

Mr. McDUFFIE replied to some of the arguments that had been advanced in favor of the duty; urged the thriving condition of the Western States during the last war, when they fed the armies of the United States; insisted that their present distresses arose not from a want of protection, but from their banking system, and the rise in the value of specie. Cotton, he said, had been a subject of most disastrous speculation. A vast amount of capital had been vested in it when it was thirty cents a pound; now it was twelve cents. The Southern States had suffered as much as any part of the Union. All the articles of the tariff bore hard on those States. They were articles manufactured by Great Britain, and for which she takes the cotton of this country. If we cease to receive them, she will change her market for cotton. It is her fixed policy not to take raw materials from those who will not take her manufactures, and as soon as this bill passes she will force a trade with South America. There was a distinction between the sugar planters and cotton growers. Arguments applicable to one did not apply to the other. The Western States would lose their trade in live stock with the Southern States, as those States would now raise for themselves. If they have tried tobacco, and so many other articles, and still failed; if they, with their new and fertile soil, cannot compete in these things with the sterile and worn out fields of Carolina and Virginia, it proves there must be something wrong in their state of society; that evil was their banking system. They cry out for protection against the little towns of Inverness and Dundee, as if some army was invading them, because the poor Scotch weaver can work for sixpence a day. It was vain to compete, while the labor in Kentucky was four times as high as in Scotland. The Speaker cries out, Save us from the overwhelming influence of—what? Little Dundee. He would agree to protect wherever we can make within ten per cent. of the price of the foreign article, but not till then. He repeated his warnings on the subject of British retaliation, as he knew no article of a small amount where a duty was more directed to the very vitals of her polity than that on bagging.

He was succeeded by Mr. FORWARD, of Pennsylvania, who advocated the duty and repelled the argument which attributed the reduced price of coarse cottons to the amount of machinery employed in their fabrication. The same reduction had taken place in umbrellas, leather, hats, &c., all which had a duty of thirty and forty per cent., and were immediately reduced in price, and are now articles of export. He challenged gentlemen to show a single article, under our present tariff, the material of which was in plenty, and the duty high, that had not at once been reduced to a minimum price. He dwelt on the spirit of rivalry between the British factories and ours, and said that it had been stated on the floor of Parliament, that, if her goods were sold abroad at a sacrifice, Britain had an equivalent in the stifling of our manufactures. Gentlemen had spoken highly of Adam Smith. Did they remember that, in his famous book, he had one chapter expressly devoted to us, in which he congratulated his country on having stores among us, and doing our business in their shipping? Our manufactures were liable to be destroyed by foreigners, and never had succeeded till they got protection. Where was the proof that Britain would cease to take our cotton? Did she cease to take it, even when we laid our duty on coarse cottons themselves? She dare not do so. France is her rival in the cotton manufacture, and she must have the best. All the predictions now urged had been urged before, and none of them were fulfilled, but just the contrary had happened. He produced a letter from one of the Navy Commissioners, which says, that American hemp, when water-rotted, was as good as the Russian. Why don't you raise it then? This was just the question asked before the tariff of 1816, in relation to umbrellas, and shoes, and hats. Why don't you make them as cheap? The tariff had answered the question then, and it would answer it again.

Mr. WARFIELD, of Maryland, opposed the duty, and supported his objections by a calculation in figures, showing, as we understood him, that on the amount of cotton raised last year, (of 850,000 bales,) the proposed bill would lay a tax of forty-six and two-thirds per cent.; the result of which would be, that $111,000 would be paid by the American manufacturer, and $230,000 by the foreign.

Mr. GOVAN, of South Carolina, spoke for the first time. He opposed the duty in a short speech, in which he insisted that three millions of yards of bagging would be required for the consumption of the cotton growing States, for which they would have to pay Kentucky, under this duty, supposing it to be prohibitory, a million of dollars; and that she would take nothing from them, in exchange for her produce, but gold and silver.

Mr. WICKLIFFE, of Kentucky, resisted with warmth the implied charge of indolence, which he understood as cast upon the Kentucky population, by Mr. McDUFFIE. He retorted the charge respecting the bank policy, to which, he said, Kentucky had been invited by the example of other States. He insisted on the good quality of American hemp; and said, that there were eleven States that could engage in the growing of it. The sugar of Louisiana, at three cents, gained more than the whole amount of duty laid for bagging on all the Southern States put together. As to the trade of driving live stock, it had ruined almost all concerned in it.

The question was then taken, on Mr. BRENT's motion to strike out the whole clause; and lost—ayes 94, noes 107.

Mr. BUCHANAN then renewed his motion to change the duty from six cents to four-and-a-half cents per square yard, which was agreed to—ayes 119.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR then moved to strike out the clause laying a duty of twenty-five cents per bushel on imported wheat. He would submit a very few remarks to the Committee, in support of his motion. The bill seemed to proceed upon the principle of a compensation of equivalents, by affording to the respective interests of the country, their relative share of legislative protection. In relation to the article of wheat, he thought that a few plain considerations would satisfy the Committee, that a duty on importation would be wholly inefficient to the attainment of the end proposed; that it would present the appearance of aid to that description of agriculture, whilst, in practical operation, it would produce no substantial result. For his own part, he had never heard of more than about three cargoes of foreign wheat being imported into the United States; if he were incorrect in this, he would ask any member of the Committee to correct his mistake, by affording information on the subject.

The United States, then, are not an importing but an exporting country in relation to this article. Now, it must be a palpable principle of political economy (if he could venture to use that expression, which had incurred so much denunciation,) that a commodity which can successfully sustain a competition in the foreign market, not only without the aid of our duty on importation, which then cannot operate but with the disadvantage of the price of transportation, &c., cannot need that aid, as against the same foreign article in the home market, where ours would be relieved from these disadvantages, and the foreign one would be subject to them. The duty upon importation clearly can only effectually operate where the dutiable article is imported; but where, as in this case, it either is not imported at all, or in quantities utterly inconsiderable, it cannot afford any practical aid.

Gentlemen seem, on many occasions, to be desirous of imitating the British example, in its protecting system. Permit me to remind the Committee of the course pursued by that Government in relation to its agricultural interest, by means of its corn laws. Until about the year 1761, Great Britain was, in some degree, an exporting country of corn. At that time, they aided their agricultural interest by a bounty. Since the period stated, she has been mostly an importing country; and since this change in her situation, she has prohibited importation until wheat has risen to a given sum per quarter. The application which I propose to make of the example just stated, is this: that legislation, in relation to this subject, to produce any practical result, ought to be adapted to the situation and circumstances of the country. When the country is an importing one, then a duty upon importation is appropriate and effectual; but when, as is the case with us, the country is an exporting one, then a duty on importation is utterly inappropriate and inoperative; and, then, if you propose to give aid which shall be effectual, it should be by bounty, which will operate upon exportation. Considering, then, the situation of this country, that its character was that, not of an importing, but an exporting one; and that, consequently, the proposed duty was an apparent, not a substantial aid, he wished it to be stricken out, because he did not, on the part of his constituents, wish to have the form of protection, whilst, according to the view he had taken, they certainly had not the substance.

The Committee now rose and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 27.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the cases of Ica Robertson, Joseph Rosson, and Robert Tolar; which was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the same committee, to which was recommitted the bill for the relief of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and others, reported the same without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to repeal, in part, an act, entitled 'An act to lessen the compensation for marshals, clerks, and attorneys, in the cases therein mentioned,'" reported their agreement to the said amendment; which was concurred in by the House.

Mr. SANDFORD moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of bringing in a bill to provide by law for all settlers on the public lands of the United States; or, where they have made any improvements thereon, and the sale of the public land, where improvements have been made as aforesaid, should take place after the first day of March in any year thereafter, the occupant shall have the right of holding his improvement for one year, or until the first of March next after the sale of said land.

The said resolution was read, and negatived by the House.

On motion of Mr. O'BRIEN, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a term of the district court of the United States in the town of Machias, in the State of Maine, and of raising the salary of the judge of said court.

On motion of Mr. WARFIELD, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the payment of any balance due by the Government to the collectors of the internal revenue.

On motion of Mr. McLEAN, of Ohio, the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending to Joseph Atset, a soldier engaged in the service of the United States, during the Revolutionary war, the provisions of an act of Congress, passed the 18th of March, 1818, entitled "An act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war;" and the several supplementary acts thereunto, passed 1st of May, 1820, and 3d of March, 1823.

On motion of Mr. OWEN, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation to compensate the friendly Creek Indians, for property lost and destroyed during the late Creek war.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, by leave of the House, presented a memorial and remonstrance of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, in the State of Connecticut, against the passage of the bill now pending in this House, to amend the several acts imposing duties on imports.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War on the memorial of Thomas Baldwin, which was laid on the table.

A motion was made by Mr. OWEN, that the House do now proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on the 19th instant, and which had been, subsequently, amended, and laid on the table.

And the question, Will the House now consider the said resolution? being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 59, nays 114, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Massachusetts, J. S. Barbour, Bartlett, Blair, Brent, Buck, Cambreleng, Cary, Cassedy, Cobb, Cocke, Crowninshield, Cushman, Forsyth, Garnett, Gist, Gurley, Hamilton, Harvey, Hayden, Herrick, Hobart, Hooks, Ingham, Isacks, Jennings, Kidder, Leftwich, Lincoln, Livermore, Livingston, Locke, McKee, McKim, Mitchell of Pennsylvania, Moore of Alabama, Neale, O'Brien, Owen, Plumer of New Hampshire, Poinsett, Rankin, Reynolds, Rose, Sandford, Sharpe, Sibley, Arthur Smith, Alexander Smith, William Smith, Standefer, Thompson of Georgia, Tucker of South Carolina, Vance of North Carolina, Van Rensselaer, Warfield, Williams of New York, Williams of Virginia, and Wilson of South Carolina.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the several acts laying duties on imports. The pending question being on the motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, to strike from the bill the proposed duty of twenty-five cents per bushel on wheat—

Mr. GARNETT, of Virginia, said such repeated claims to protection had been founded, by the manufacturers, on the encouragement supposed to have been given to agriculture, that it was the interest of the agriculturists, who knew this notion to be the merest fallacy in the world, to strike from the bill every item which purported to be for their benefit. With this view, he had moved the other day to strike out an item, on which, he supposed, at some future period, a pretext might be founded for saying a small portion of a small section of our country, namely, the fruit-growers of Florida, had been protected. Had he known at the time that the bill contained a proposition for a duty on wheat, (a circumstance that had escaped his notice, from his cursory perusal of it,) he should have struck at that game rather than the other, which was of inferior importance. It was fortunate, however, that he did not know it, as it was the means of the motion being made by his worthy colleague, who was much more able to sustain it.

This attempt to raise the price of wheat, Mr. G. observed, was one of the most remarkable examples of the progress of the American Legislature in the science of political economy which had ever been exhibited. If it was not for the respect which he entertained for the gentlemen who composed the Committee on Manufactures, he should really have supposed that the duty had been introduced merely ad captandium—to induce the agriculturists to compound for the certain evil contained in the bill for the promise of contingent good; but the respect he had for these gentlemen forbade the idea that they would endeavor to accomplish, by sleight of hand, by legerdemain, and management, what they could not effect by the force of reason and truth. And, indeed, as this idea of raising the price of grain was not the only extraordinary thing in the theory of political economy which they had adopted, he had no right to attribute to them any other motive than the ostensible one. It was remarked, said Mr. G., by one of the most distinguished writers of the present age, the celebrated Malthus, that, to know what we can do, and how to do it, is the most valuable species of information we can possess. The next is, to know what we cannot do, and why we cannot do it. It appeared to him that, in the present state of our legislation, the latter information was more desirable than the former; for, under the belief that we can do a good which we cannot do, we are about to do an evil which we certainly can do. Under the belief that we can protect agriculture, we are about to ruin it. He said under this belief, because it had been repeatedly avowed, in the course of the debate, by gentlemen, that they would not support the bill but from a conviction that its pressure on the different portions of the country, and several classes of the community, would be equal. If it could be made to appear that Congress could not efficiently protect agriculture, gentlemen would be bound, consistently with their own declarations, to withdraw their support from the bill—and that it could be made to appear, was unquestionable. He laid it down, as an incontrovertible position, that, with respect to all the great staples of agriculture, of which the country produced a sufficiency for home consumption, and a surplus to export, the price was regulated by that portion of it which went abroad. Suppose a cargo of foreign wheat comes to one of the ports of this country, whilst the American merchant is shipping domestic wheat to another country, and that it can be sold here cheaper than the domestic wheat: Will not the merchant purchase it in preference to the domestic wheat, and ship it instead? And why will he? Because, getting it cheaper, he makes a greater profit on it. But does not this prove that the owner himself may make the profit? Will he be stupid enough to permit the American merchant to make a profit which he can make himself? Will he not carry his wheat himself to the foreign market, and drive us out of that, before he comes in competition with us in our own? And will he not, to avoid additional expense, go thither directly, instead of touching at our ports? It is self-evident that he will, and, that the necessary condition of a competition with us in our own markets, will be, our previous exclusion from the foreign market. A few straggling cargoes that may come to this country, prove nothing to the contrary. The same was true of all the great staples of our agriculture—corn, tobacco, rice, cotton, &c. With respect to cotton, even if the duty could be added to the price, which was impossible, it would be only a tax on the manufacturer to the extent of his individual consumption. In the same way, it would be a tax on the cotton grower, who would pay back to the manufacturer the amount of the duty advanced to him on the raw article. Even with respect to sugar, and other agricultural commodities, the production of which was limited by climate or other causes, competition had a much more rapid effect in reducing prices, than it had in manufactures. Where the lands of the first quality had not all been brought into cultivation, there was no limit to the increase of the supply but the quantity of labor that could be applied. By clearing the land, and rendering it more arable, the facility of production was increased—the same labor could produce more. It was otherwise in manufactures. Additional labor could not permanently diminish prices, unless it was accompanied by improvement in skill, in machinery, by augmented capital, or by some other circumstance that facilitated production, and enabled the same labor to produce more, and these circumstances were generally of slow acquisition, never greatly exceeding the immediate wants of society. The reason why competition from mere additional labor could not permanently diminish the price of manufactures was, that, if a great supply should be thrown into the market, and thus sink the price below the cost of production, the commodity would cease to be produced; and, if this was continued for any length of time, the capital itself of the manufacturer would be destroyed. With land it was different. Mere labor, without additional skill, increased the facility of production. But even when an extraordinary supply reduced the price of its products below the cost of production, and a certain quantity of land thereby ceased to be cultivated, it was not like the capital of the manufacturer, destroyed, but might be recurred to again, whenever a diminished supply produced a new demand. There was, then, no justice in considering the protection to agriculture as an offset to that of manufactures. It must, necessarily, be partial and temporary. A protection to a small portion of the country, which burdened the rest, was no excuse for burdening the whole. It was most extraordinary to hear gentlemen contend that competition diminished the price of manufactures, but that competition increased the price of agricultural products. He should really like to hear by what ingenuity they explained these opposite and contradictory effects.

When gentlemen fly in the face of received maxims, sanctioned by the universal experience of mankind, they cannot expect, whatever confidence we may have in their opinions, that we shall receive them with implicit faith. When a statesman affirms that a measure will be followed by a consequence, he should be able to explain in what manner the cause and effect are connected with each other. He should be glad to hear some attempt to show in what manner the duty on wheat would raise the price. Until it was made, he should beg leave to differ with gentlemen. It was not by any legislative quackery—by any hocus pocus of law—that this effect could be produced. He hoped the agriculturists would unite to strike from this bill every thing that was pretended to be for their benefit. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. COBB) had very liberally, (or at least very wisely, for liberality implied sacrifice, and there was none,) offered to give his vote to take off the duty on cotton. He hoped we should strike out the duty on wheat, and that, by striking it out, we should show at least one thing; and that was, that we were not opposed to an entire prohibition of soft corn.

The affairs of the agriculturists of this country, said Mr. G., have reached a most eventful crisis. It behooved them to look well to consequences in future. Never had a set of men been so indifferent to their own interests, and never had men suffered more from their own folly. Though possessing a numerical superiority, they had, by their own injudicious policy, reared up classes hostile in their principles, and formidable in their strength. By the funding system they had created a moneyed capital—they had given these capitalists a bank to increase their profits. That portion of the capital which took the direction of manufactures had been increased by a system of protecting duties, and the manufacturers had now a direct influence in the House, altogether disproportionate to their numbers and importance. No doubt the considerations of public good which prompted their representatives to prosecute the prohibitory policy, were, in many instances, seconded by motives of individual interest. The manufacturers were not only indebted to the folly of the agriculturists, but to their own sagacity and industry. Nothing could exceed the zeal and activity with which they had promoted their objects. It was almost incredible. Among other means, they appeared to have organized a corps of writers—writers whose productions, to judge by the quantity, absolutely rivalled the effects of machinery. These literary machines produced vast supplies of pamphlets, which, containing a jumble of patriotic notions, partial statements, and fallacious reasoning, were circulated gratis—sent into the remotest corners of the country, by posts, pedlars, and other conveyances, and often fell into the hands of simple farmers, who, having no opportunity to hear the other side, were captivated with their specious statements, and often made converts to a system which would ruin them. He had been told of a gentleman in Virginia who last year sent a parcel of wool to the North to exchange for domestic cloth, and, when the cloth arrived, and the bale was opened, he found in it twelve copies of the Report of the Committee on Manufactures, a book of eighty or a hundred pages—no doubt thrown in gratis, to make up for the additional cost of the cloth; though (without intending to disparage the merits of the report, the writer of which he knew to be a man of abilities,) it might be questioned whether the receiver regarded the present in the same light with the donor.

The Tariff Bill.

But the agriculturists, many of them, were really interested in manufactures. The disbursement of money benefited the farmers in the neighborhood, and produced an appearance of prosperity, which had been relied on as an argument in favor of the system; though it was evident that this prosperity was at the expense of the great bulk of the agriculturists. This accounted for the petitions of agriculturists in favor of protecting duties, which some had considered as matter of surprise. If you were to build palaces instead of factories, and endow the occupants with revenues drawn from other quarters of the country, the disbursements would benefit the farmers, who were contiguous; palaces would become as popular as factories, and we should, no doubt, see your table loaded with petitions, portraying, in very pathetic language, the sufferings of the occupants. Whilst the manufacturers had been unremitting and indefatigable in their exertions, the agriculturists had been, generally, supine and inactive. They had, in some places organized societies, whose remonstrances had had a good effect. But those societies met occasionally only—apparently more to banquet than to do business. The zeal of a few was great, but the greater part of their members were indifferent to the political interests of agriculture. When they signed a remonstrance, they probably forgot it before it reached Congress. After discharging this task, they retired, reposing, in fancy at least, on the laurels of victory; and remained perfectly quiet, until a new tariff aroused them from their slumbers, and summoned them to a new remonstrance and another banquet. Agriculture and its interests are neglected and despised. Agriculture, the great source of our wealth, like the militia, the great bulwark of our defence, makes a figure in Fourth of July orations and toasts; but, like the militia, it is toasted, flattered, and despised. We are a despised people—of which our whole legislation is a proof—but there were minor proofs.

Four years ago, a new committee had been created, called the Committee on Agriculture. The circumstances of its creation proved, that it was not intended to devise ways and means for the positive encouragement of agriculture, but to protect its political interests from encroachment. The Committee on Manufactures had been separated from that of commerce; had reported a great tariff which had passed the House. The day after this bill passed, it was, that a gentleman from North Carolina moved to raise this new committee. The committee had been truly symbolical of the interest it represents. As the gentleman from New York, (Mr. CAMBRELENG,) had truly told the House, whilst the other committees had obtained spacious apartments in which to hold their deliberations, that on agriculture had never, until this session, had an apartment at all; but had been bandied about from one room to another, and sometimes indebted even to the Committee on Manufactures, their most deadly enemies, (he spoke of their principles,) for a place to sit in. And now they had a room, it was more like a dungeon than any thing else. It had a single window, looking towards some interior part of the building, into which the sun never darted a ray. This might be called a trifle—and a trifle it certainly was—but feathers show how the wind blows. This was not all. A majority of the committee were in favor of the protecting duty system, no doubt honestly, conscientiously. But, whilst the manufacturers were provided with a committee, to prepare, organize, and concentrate the means of attack, the agriculturists had no committee to prepare, organize, and concentrate the means of defence. He owed it to justice to say, that he had the best reason to believe, that the competition of the committee was purely the result of accident or inadvertence—and inadvertence to the concerns of agriculture, no one had a right to impute, as a fault, to another, for all were equally culpable. But, if it were any advantage at all to have a committee, it was one which the agriculturists were deprived of. It was now time for the agriculturists to change their conduct, if they did not wish to be driven to choose between the alternatives of ruin and resistance. But the Speaker had told us, that he had known several tariffs to pass through the House, accompanied, in every instance, with the predictions of ruin or resistance. But the predictions were not verified: no resistance had taken place. He asked the honorable Speaker, whether it was doing justice to his own liberality, to his own philanthropy, to use this language? Was it not cruel, was it not to taunt us, thus to extract from our patience, forbearance, and long suffering, an argument for putting them to a still severer trial? What! because the mechanical pressure has not yet depressed the spring to the point of re-action, shall it be increased? Because the degree of tension has not been sufficient to snap the chord, are further experiments to be made, in order to ascertain its strength? Political writers had frequently predicted, that the national debt of Great Britain would ruin the nation. Their predictions had not proved true—not that they were mistaken in supposing the national debt to be an evil: but that they had miscalculated the prodigious productive powers of the country, and its capacity to resist the evil. So the agriculturists of the South, in predicting that the unjust and oppressive system pursued towards them, would produce resistance, were not mistaken as to the ruinous effect of the system; but they had miscalculated their capacity of endurance, in comparison with their sense of suffering—they had underrated their attachment to the Union, compared with their ability to endure oppression. The Speaker would not undertake to deny, that the Southern States were in a ruinous condition. What was the cause? Vain and visionary philosophers had speculated on these causes. Some had ascribed them to slavery, some to climate, ardent spirits, tobacco, and to other fantastic causes; but we had always had these things, and had sometimes enjoyed very great prosperity; these, therefore, were not the causes. It was nothing more nor less than this: the taxation of the General Government did not leave us income enough to appropriate to the improvement of the soil. Our laws had made the profits of capital greater than the profits of land and labor. It was this that had driven our population into distant lands, reduced them to beggary, and spread desolation over the country. He admitted the influence of State legislation, and the refusal of foreigners to receive our agricultural products. But what was the instrument by which the State legislatures in the South had produced the greatest mischief? It was banks. And what gave rise to them? The General Government had created a moneyed interest in the Northern States. Banks were established for the benefit of the capitalist; and, when the Southern States adopted them, the argument was—at least he knew this to be the case as respected Virginia—that they were necessary to avoid being tributaries to the Northern banks. As regarded our exclusion from foreign markets, he conceded that it was in some degree owing to the general pacification in Europe, which had liberated a great deal of labor that had been then applied to agriculture; but it was also, in some measure, owing to our own policy. By our heavy duties, we augmented the price of foreign manufactures; diminished our consumption of them; thus compelled the manufacturers to turn agriculturists, and then complained that they would not receive our breadstuffs. Why, the true remedy for this was to reverse our system, to retrace our steps, to cheapen manufactures, increase their consumption, and thus to tempt agricultural labor to find more profitable employment. He had no sort of doubt, that if, by a diminution of price, or by increased means of purchasing, we could consume double the quantity of foreign manufactures, we should give a stimulus to manufacturing industry, which would attract agricultural labor from the poor lands to which it had been obliged to resort, for want of better employment, and thus, by diminishing the quantity of breadstuffs, which were produced at a very great cost, below the domestic consumption, compel foreign nations again to open their ports to us. After all, the General Government was the great causa causans of our distresses.

But the Speaker had said, that, while the South declared that it would be ruined with the tariff, other portions of the country asserted, with equal confidence, that they would be ruined without it, and that this was a Government in which the majority must govern. Supposing the latter assertion to be true, he asked whether one portion of the country had a right to save itself from ruin by ruining another? If the smallest member of the Confederacy would be ruined by a system of taxation, the Federal Government would have no right to adopt it; for, in order to preserve the political relation of the States, the Constitution in granting the power of taxation, even for the great purposes of the common defence and general welfare, had prescribed equality as the indispensable condition of its exercise. That this system would ruin the Southern States, he was prepared to show whenever the general question came to be discussed. The Southern States, said Mr. G., have been the victims of the policy of this Government ever since its commencement. They have borne nearly the whole burden of taxation. The funding, banking, protecting duty, and pension systems, had all fallen, in their operation, on the Southern States. I have read somewhere of an African Prince, who, whenever he wants to tax his subjects, takes a windy day, puts a cap lightly on his head, goes out of doors, and, in whatever direction the wind blows the cap, the people in that direction are taxed. It appears to me, that, from whatever quarter the wind blows, the cap of the General Government always comes to the South; whether it be from East, Northeast—he had forgotten how to box the compass—but, whether it be from East, or any other point, northabout to West, it was the same thing. We were first made acquainted with this fatal cap by a hurricane called funding. It was brought among us soon after by another, called a bank—in both instances, to the great sorrow of all, except those who felt that it was an ill wind that blows nobody any good. We are now again threatened with this unwelcome re-visitation from two terrible tornadoes—one from the East, called a tariff, and the other from the West, called internal improvement, which, meeting in the same point, from opposite directions, might, according to the laws of mechanical philosophy, keep the cap stationary, but a new impetus comes from the North, and again gives it its old due direction to the South. These chilling and blasting winds that have come among us, warmed by the genial heat of the South, have returned, spreading luxuriance and verdure over the country, fertilizing and fructifying the land. But, if they come now, they come in vain; and the revivifying principle is gone, our sun is dimmed, our light is put out. The farmer of the South, like the silly sheep he shears, has suffered fleece after fleece to be taken from his back, until he has no longer a lock of wool left to gratify the avarice of his shearers; and he has now the melancholy prospect before him of being butchered and devoured, and that, too, without the usual privilege of being previously fattened. Because, like an old dray-horse, that now and then flings out his heels at his driver, to make a show of resistance, he occasionally grumbles or remonstrates, he has vainly thought himself free. A few cracks of the whip have generally quieted him; but if you come to lay the whip on his back—to apply the thong to his skin, I do not know whether he is quite prepared to stand this test of his humility. It is really necessary to put our shoulders to the wheel, unless we mean to submit without further struggle. The time is come when we must either “do or die.” I have heard said, that this is the wisest Congress that has been assembled for many years. It may be so; but, if some of the propositions that are now before it, such as the project for internal improvement—for crusading in favor of universal emancipation, and last, though not least, for a new tariff, are adopted, it will not be the first Legislature I have known, whose acts, at least in my humble judgment, were in the inverse ratio of its reputed wisdom.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, then rose, and said, that, from the observations of gentlemen since the present debate commenced, a stranger might be led to conclude that some desperate plot was carrying on against the agriculture of this country, and some new principle started, in the legislative course pursued respecting it. But nothing was further from the fact. In the tariff of 1816, while articles for the use of the United States, articles calculated for the improvement of manufactures, and such as were intended to improve the mode of agriculture, were admitted duty free, wheat was charged with a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem. At an average price of $1 50 per bushel, this 15 per cent. amounts to 22½ cents per bushel—within 2½ cents of that now proposed. This 2½ cents was added to the former duty, because that duty had not been found sufficient to prevent considerable importations of wheat from the Black Sea, but chiefly from Upper Canada. The principle on which the duty was laid, was to secure to the American agriculturist the whole of the American market. At its former amount it failed to do this, and therefore it had been raised to the present amount of 25 cents.

The gentleman from Virginia had not only represented the tariff as one great evil, but internal improvements as another. Now, how the gentlemen, many of whom were decided friends to the bill for internal improvements, could be enemies to this item, he did not understand. The object of the internal improvement bill, as it respected the agricultural interest, was to facilitate the access of the farmer's produce, to a market. The object of this provision is to secure him a market at his own door. Here Mr. T. stated the effect produced by the great canal of New York, in raising the comparative value of agricultural articles raised at a distance from market—(a bushel of wheat, at Rochester, was not worth more than a bushel of oats, within thirty miles of Albany; but the canal abolished this difference entirely; of crackers, made at Auburn, seven were now sold in New York for one cent.) He hoped the article would either be suffered to stand, or that the gentleman from Virginia would move an amendment, making wheat duty-free altogether.

Mr. CLAY rose, not to enter into the discussion, but to reply to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia, respecting the Committee on Agriculture. He said, that when he had placed at the head of that committee, a gentleman from New York, the largest agriculturist in this Union, (General Van Rensselaer,) a gentleman who had ploughed hundreds of acres where the gentleman from Virginia had ploughed one; when he had put on it other gentlemen who were either themselves agriculturists, or the decided friends of agriculture—above all, when the gentleman from Virginia, himself a host, was added to the committee—and, he might add, when the presiding officer of this House was one who had formerly ploughed hundreds of acres with his own hands, he did think the interests of agriculture were pretty well taken care of here. In the commencement of a session, the occupations of all the members could not be known at once—the presiding officer had to exercise a faculty which he had heard was peculiarly possessed in some parts of the United States, he had to guess a little in the appointment of committees—but he felt some doubt whether the gentleman from Virginia would have found it easy to make a better selection. That gentleman seemed to think there existed some general conspiracy against the interests of agriculture—if all who had petitioned for the tariff were to be considered as conspirators, the conspiracy was extensive indeed—(here Mr. C. enumerated seventeen States.) The whole State of New York en masse was in the plot, so was all Pennsylvania en masse—nay, there were conspirators even in Virginia;—the mischief seemed to extend throughout the Union—and, considering its extent, and the character of those concerned in it, the interests of agriculture must be in serious danger.

Mr. BAYLIES repelled the idea that the Committee on Manufactures were to be considered as deadly enemies to the Committee on Agriculture—nor were that part of the Agricultural Committee, who were in sentiment friendly to the tariff, at all inimical to agriculture or false to their trust. The two interests were inseparably connected, especially in the Eastern States. The prosperity of the manufactures of New England had enriched the farmers of New England.

Mr. GARNETT replied, that he had guarded his language when he uttered it, and had said that he believed the gentlemen were upright and sincere, but he thought, nevertheless, that their principles were, in their tendency, hostile to agriculture. As to the compliments of the honorable Speaker, the agricultural interest would have been much more indebted to him, if he had taken a few more members of the committee from South of the Potomac.

Mr. CLAY again explained, as to the structure of the committee. The members were all either farmers, or persons decidedly attached to the farming interest. It was not always possible to observe latitudes, especially where the number of a committee consisted but of seven. Not one Western man had been put on it. The Committee on Manufactures, too, consisted almost entirely of farmers. Surely the gentleman from Virginia ought rather to suspect the soundness of his own views, than to set himself up as a standard, and arraign all who differed from him in sentiment. For himself, Mr. C. believed that the interests of agriculture would be prostrated, not if the bill did, but if it did not pass.

Mr. TOP, of Pennsylvania, (chairman of the Committee of Manufactures,) observed, that he had lived long enough to know, that not much was ever got by complaining—yet he thought he had some ground of complaint in what had fallen from the gentleman from Virginia. He had certainly attributed to the committee who reported the bill more sagacity than belonged to them—he seemed to think that they had laid this duty as a lure to attract folks—and he seemed determined to show that he understood trap, and would reject the bait as far as Virginia was concerned. If Virginia were only a wheat-raising State, this might be very magnanimous—but it happened that she exports double the value in tobacco, of all the flour and wheat not only exported from within her own bounds, but from all the rest of the Union beside. The amount of tobacco exported, (he spoke without book,) amounted to about six millions of dollars in a year. The gentleman, to show his contempt for the protection of this duty, says, take it away altogether—Virginia don't want it. But, if he wants to show his magnanimity and his contempt for protection, let him bring forward a proposition to allow tobacco, something that his constituents can understand, to be imported duty free. This bill only proposes to change the ad valorem to a specific duty, and what a bustle is created—what a trap is laid. Yet this is the only country in the civilized world that has not a specific duty on wheat. The amount imported, even seaward, is not so very small—three cargoes will probably amount to 20,000 bushels; so much of the market was lost to our farmers—and those that brought it made money by the importation. Now the gentleman contends that it is a rule of trade to buy where we can get cheapest—let him bring this principle home to the farmer. Let that gentleman ask the yeomanry of this country, whether we shall bring wheat from Dantzic because we can get it cheaper—they will soon answer him. Yet this would but fairly bring up and test the general principle of the bill with respect to manufactures—lead, wool, iron, are as plenty in this country, and as necessary in their place, as wheat, and why not as deserving of protection? The gentleman says, that the Committee on Agriculture should all be anti-manufacture men—and because they are not, he says they are enemies to agriculture; if so, it was certainly good generalship, to put them down in a dark place where they can do it no harm.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose to reply. He said he had not the least pretension to any thing like wit—it did not belong to him. Still less could he lay any claim to skill in trapping. Whether as trapper, or trappee, he desired to enter his protest against having any thing to do with it. He knew nothing about either trapping or tricking, but pursued a straightforward course as nearly as he could by a mathematical line of strict propriety. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Manufactures must have imagined for himself the idea which he had attributed to him, as he had never thought of imputing it to that committee. I said, and I still say, that this duty will not benefit the country. The gentleman has said that Virginia is a tobacco-growing country, and he has undertaken to give us a statement of the amount to which she exports that article, in which it is quite palpable that he spoke (as he said) without book.

[Here Mr. TOP explained, that he meant the six millions as the value of the whole export of that article in the Union.]

Sir, said Mr. B., it happens that that my native State is richer in almost every thing than in money. The great embarrassment under which she labors is the want of capital, from whence it happens that many of the merchants of Virginia are mere factors for the merchants of New York. The tobacco, which swells the nominal amount of the exports of Virginia, belongs, in fact, to the exports of North Carolina—because that State, as was very truly and very handsomely said the other day, is "iron bound," as respects her coast. I also am without book, yet I think I can come nearer, within two or three millions, at least, than the gentleman from Pennsylvania did. The finest tobacco raised in Virginia, (I speak of that grown on the South mountain, where it is said the soil is peculiarly adapted to the culture of that plant,) may bring $10, and possibly $12 per cwt.; other samples sell at $2 to $3. The fair average is about $5 the hundred, which is about five cents a pound. This, according to the gentleman's first statement, would require Virginia to produce one hundred and twenty millions of pounds of tobacco annually. But whatever it amount to, I have not introduced any proposition respecting it, and simply for this reason I wish to pursue the subject before us, in other words to stick to the text. Now, tobacco has nothing to do with our present discussion. Besides, the chief part of the tobacco raised in Virginia, is raised south of James river, and I reside north of that river. In my district the great staple is wheat; and in whatever affects that article, my constituents are immediately concerned. I rose with the purpose of showing that the proposed duty is inefficient as an encouragement to agriculture, and gives to it the form of protection without the reality.

Mr. TRACY, of New York, said, that although the duty now proposed might not, in the opinion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, be of any service to that State, there were gentlemen on this floor who represented other districts of the Union, which grew far greater quantities of wheat than the district from which that gentleman came, and whose opinions were worthy of respect. He thought that no duty could be more reasonable than that now under discussion, (unless the bill had been intended for revenue.) He knew that the amount of wheat imported from the north and the south of Europe, from the Baltic and the Black sea, was not inconsiderable; but, had the gentleman from Virginia reflected a moment, he might have found one of the finest wheat countries in the world, immediately adjacent to the State of New York—a country from which wheat can be brought in abundance to compete in the same market with that of the gentleman's own district, and undersell him. To his personal knowledge, 5,000 bushels were imported by a single miller at Rochester the last year. It sold in Canada at from 38 to 45 cents the bushel—its transportation to Rochester cost from 15 to 20 cents, and it sold there at 70 and 75 cents a bushel, while that raised in the State of New York was selling at a dollar. It was floured at Rochester, and sent to New York to compete with the wheat from Virginia and Maryland. As soon as the great canal shall be finished to Lake Erie, another large district of Upper Canada will be brought into the field of competition, and its wheat will go to that city without a single rod of land transportation. For himself, he felt so entirely satisfied that the policy on which the present duty was founded was a correct policy, that he intended to move the adoption of a duty on imported flour. Of this article large quantities came in from Canada, and it was sold at Rochester at $2 a barrel, and he believed had, at one time, brought but $1 75, and this with a duty of 15 per cent. ad valorem. A single merchant, in Upper Canada, had sent to Oswego, last year, 3,000 barrels, and it went to New York for exportation. Was it sound policy thus to give away to strangers the benefit of those invaluable facilities which our own citizens had attained at so great a cost?

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, thought that if this duty was perfectly nugatory because of no use to Virginia, the distinguished gentleman from that State only wasted his great talents in an attempt to abolish it. Why not indulge the friends of the bill in an item that he owned could do no harm, and which they believed might be of essential benefit in other parts of the country? Must Virginia be the sole standard according to which every measure is to be tested? It had been shown that great quantities of the Canada wheat came down the New York canal. Now the people of New York made that canal for themselves and the citizens of their sister States, and not for the subjects of His Majesty—shall we let in foreigners to compete with our own citizens in our own agricultural staples, and this while the country is suffering for a market? Surely it is the duty of the Government to protect the country against such an intrusion.

Mr. MARVIN, of New York, (a member of the Committee on Manufactures) said, that since there had been some speculation as to the motives of the committee in putting this item in the bill, he would state the circumstances under which it was done. A meeting of highly respectable agriculturists was held in Queen's county, on Long Island, and resolutions were passed by them, recommending an increase of duty on several articles of agricultural production, and among others, the present article of wheat. And since the duty would, in the opinion of the committee, produce no injury, they thought it due to the citizens of that very respectable meeting, to comply thus far with their recommendation. Much wheat was imported last year—much more will be imported next. Before the great canal was begun, wheat was of the same value on both sides of Lake Ontario. When wheat was worth one dollar and twelve cents at Albany, at Rochester it was worth only fifty cents. The opening of the canal had raised it at once fifty cents. The price in Canada experienced an equal rise. Was it good policy to give this advantage to strangers and rivals, who had contributed nothing to the expense of the canal? If we lay this duty, while the wheat of our own citizens feels a rise of fifty cents, that of their competitors will get only twenty-five cents rise. And if they still prefer to use our canal, they will come into our market under that difference in our favor, and our revenue will at the same time be augmented.

Mr. HAYDEN, of New York, replied to Mr. BARBOUR, and stated that the quantity of flour imported was greater than that gentleman seemed to imagine. Nor was it brought over the lake, as he had suggested for milling merely. It was within his knowledge that a single individual, an enterprising merchant miller at Rochester, had imported the last season 4,697 bushels, the cost of which, including freight and storage, averaged sixty-three cents a bushel. The duties came to over ten cents, the cartage cost him two cents, making the total price to him seventy-five cents per bushel, while, at the same time, the American farmer was getting from a dollar to one dollar and fifteen cents the bushel. He stated these facts from a demi-official paper furnished him by the collector of the port of Genesee.

He did not doubt that, in ten years from this time, there would not be less imported into the single town of Rochester than 250,000 bushels. He then went into the following calculation to show the result:

The manufacture and materials of the barrels, 50,000, at thirty cents	- 15,000
Freight on the canal, at fifty cents	- 25,000
Tolls on the canal to State of N. York	25,000

$90,000

H. OF R.

The Tariff Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1824.

So that, looking merely at the manufacturing interest of his own district, he should view the proposed duty as injurious; but, regarding the agricultural interest, he believed it would be very beneficial. He, therefore, felt some hesitation in determining how to vote, but rather thought he should consent to the duty for the general good. It must be remembered that this wheat, when secured, went to compete with that of the Southern States. To give some idea of this trade upon the frontier, he stated that the exports from Rochester, alone, during the last year, had amounted to upwards of a million of dollars.

Mr. ROSS supported the propriety of the duty, and showed its operation in Ohio. He stated the embarrassments of the farmer in the interior, and the injury he would suffer, if foreign competition were superadded to his present want of a market; wheat had been sold in Ohio at eighteen cents a bushel; and he had known flour in Cincinnati to bring no more than $1 75.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts, said that it was necessary, on this subject, to legislate with great deliberation, and examine the probable effect of measures proposed for adoption. Imported wheat now pays fifteen per cent., ad valorem. New York exports great quantities of the article; to facilitate its transportation, she has, at vast expense, constructed a general canal. The inhabitants of Canada, finding this the most direct route to the ocean, come the same way. To meet the expense of that great public work, a large amount of tolls is required. The Canadians are glad to pay these, in addition to the fifteen per cent. duty. Now, he should certainly conceive that a transit trade of this description would be highly beneficial to the State of New York, while the duty paid upon it would, at the same time, aid the Treasury of the United States. The wheat is brought into the State, not for consumption, but for exportation. The consumption is in a foreign market. The New York wheat growers would not have that market, by denying their canal to the Canadian wheat grower. The Canadian wheat would still reach the same market, by way of the St. Lawrence, at perhaps a small addition of expense on the transportation. By admitting it, the State of New York not only gains the toll and storage, but the manufacturing of it into flour, and the shipping of it to a foreign market. The United States Treasury, the State Treasury, and the manufacturing and commercial interests, were all gainers by its transit.

Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, said that the argument of the gentleman from Massachusetts had put the question on a new ground. The question now presented to us, was, whether the United States will promote the cultivation of its own territory, or of the territory of Upper Canada? He proposes to admit the citizens of Canada to an equal participation with ourselves in all our facilities for trade, while our citizens are kept out of Canada by laws that meet and prohibit them at every step. The natural advantages of the two banks of the St. Lawrence are nearly the same; the inducement for settlement on the one in preference to the other, will depend chiefly on the regulations of the respective Governments; and, important as are the interests of manufactures, the improvement of our land is still more important.

The honorable gentleman from Virginia disregards this duty, and is willing at once to give it up. If there were no existing duty, this might seem very magnanimous; but what does the gentleman give up? A duty of $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents, in addition to $22\frac{1}{2}$ already laid. This is all that he would give up, supposing ever so much wheat to be imported; but he tells us there is none imported, or next to none; he therefore gives up nothing, or next to nothing. The gentleman refuses a proposal to take off the duty on tobacco, because other States, besides Virginia, are interested in raising it; but, are not other States concerned in raising wheat, too? Virginia has not the exclusive dominion over the growing of wheat; and could she look beyond her own boundary for any thing else than political power, she might have discovered that her neighbors have some interest in such a duty, if she has none. The gentleman from Massachusetts speaks of transit tolls, and of mercantile commissions; but these are trifling compensations for facilitating to our own market abroad the access of our agricultural rivals. Will you, by facilities like these, encourage the settlement of the territories of a (hostile I must not say, but of at least a) foreign Power?

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, said that he was, unhappily, able to speak from personal experience on this subject. He knew, for he had felt the existence and operation of Canadian rivalry. He had shipped large quantities of flour and pork, and when he got to a market, had been there put down by the competition of Canadian shippers. The whole of the military posts of the United States, on the northwest of the Ohio, had been supplied almost exclusively by the people of Upper Canada. The gentleman from Massachusetts says that this flour is not for American consumption; and he is therefore willing to strike out the duty. But it is a fact that the British Government have for years past supplied the American Army with all its flour. When I took flour to the posts, hoping to find for it an American market, I found that the contractor uniformly drew his supplies from my neighbors on the other side of the lines. Upper Canada is in this respect a much more formidable rival to the United States than gentlemen seem to conceive. It is now, and will be more and more so, one of the greatest wheat growing countries in the world.

Mr. BUCHANAN, of Pennsylvania, spoke in favor of the duty. Let the Canadian grain growers go down their own river. While our own farmers are struggling for a market, shall we bring strangers into that market on a cheaper footing than they could otherwise get there, by the use of our facilities? Europe is now in profound peace; she can grow wheat enough for her own consumption, and that of her dependencies; she may soon go farther, and seek to get the supplying of us. Let us anticipate such an idea, and meet them with a duty at our threshold.
